Nutrition Thoughts

Canning season is here again. To have quality canned food, it is necessary to use the proper methods.

Food spoilage is always a factor about which we need to be concerned. One kind, botulism, is especially dangerous, for it can be present without bad taste and with no visible signs of spoilage. In fact it isn't known often times until someone, or in many cases, several become very ill. We are very tempted to use shortcuts in canning, but the risks are too high!

Mrs. Dolores Dial and Mrs. Minnie Simmons with the Extension Expanding Nutrition Program suggest the following:

1. Do use standard jars, especially for products to be processed under pressure. This eliminates jars in which you have bought mayonnaise, etc. unless it specified that it can be used for canning.
2. Use a large pot or canner as a boiling water bath for processing fruits, tomatoes, pickled vegetables. Use a pressure canner for processing low-acid vegetables
