Food Stamp Error Better

North Carolina's food stamp error rate has gone down during a six-month period when error rates have been increasing nationally, North Carolina Department of Human Resources Secretary Dr. Sarah Morrow announced today.

Morrow said the improvement in North Carolina's food stamp error rate is the result of a concentrated effort by the state and county social services departments to improve the overall operation of the program. "We are pleased to report that North Carolina's food stamp program has operated more efficiently during the last reporting period," she said.

The food stamp program, which is largely federally funded, is designed to provide food for the poor who would not otherwise be able to afford to eat. It is administered by the individual counties under the supervision of the state's Division of Social Services. Over a half million North Carolinians receive food stamps.

Morrow said the latest figures on North Carolina's error rate, which cover a six-month period from October 1, 1981 to March 31, 1982, fall slightly below the national average of 13.15 percent. She said the state's error rate for the period was 13.07 percent, an improvement over the previous six-month period ending September 30, 1981, when the error rate reached 14.32 percent.

Error rates are based on overpayments, underpayments and payments to ineligible recipients. Morrow said the state's error rate on overpayments and payments to persons who shouldn't have received food stamps was 9.16 percent. She said the national average during the same time period was 10.57 percent.

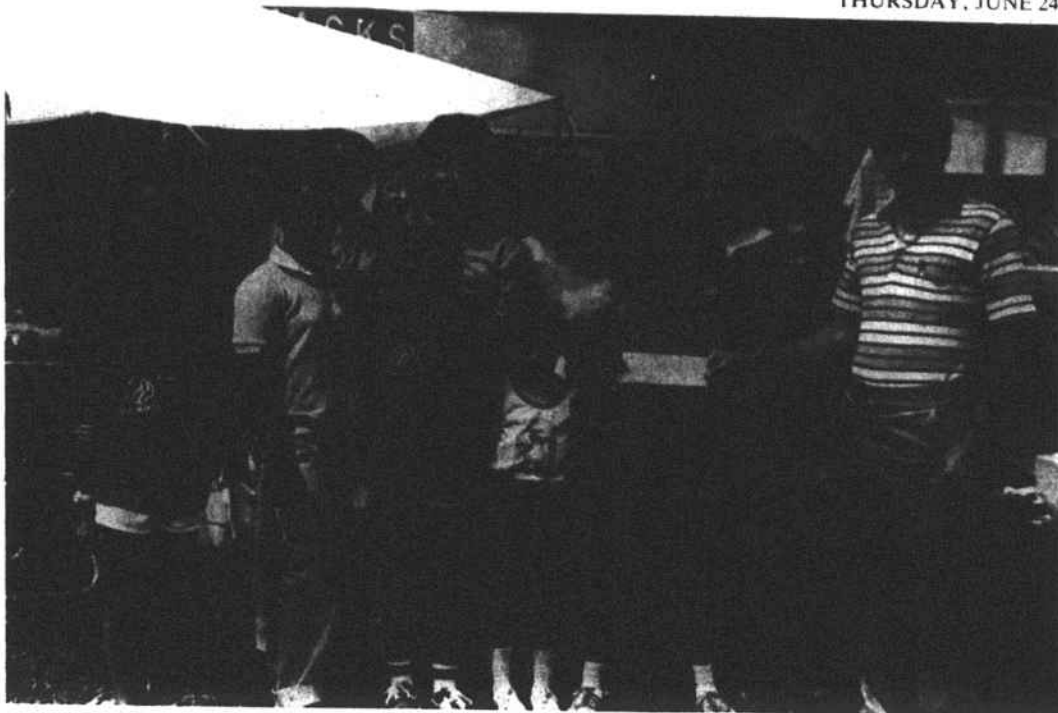

"The improvement we are now seeing in our error rate indicates to us that we are making progress in improving the way the food stamp program is administered in North Carolina," Morrow said. "Nevertheless, our error rate is still higher than we'd like, and we won't be satisfied until we get the rate down much further than it is now. A corrective action plan that our Division of Social Services put into effect in April should help us improve the error rate significantly during the next 12 months."

Dennis S. Wilkins [center] recently completed 20 years continuous service at the Raeford Plant of Burlington Industries. Wilkins has worked in the Maintenance Department during this entire period at the local plant. He began as a maintenance helper and is now a maintenance analyst planner. Wilkins received a certificate and a pearl pin - tie tac for having completed 20 years. He is shown in the picture with his supervisor Bobby Edwards [left] and Larry Nowell, Department Manager.

It takes an average of eighteen months for a one-dollar bill to wear out.
