

No More Free Ride For Cats On Rabies Vaccination Shots

Dr. John Freeman, head of the Health Department's Environmental Epidemiology Branch, has announced that his office has redrafted the State's rabies statute to include the compulsory vaccination of cats against rabies. It will be introduced in the next session of the General Assembly.

"The bill simply says that cats as well as dogs four months of age and older will be immunized against rabies," Dr. Freeman explained. "I think chances of its passage will be better this time because people are beginning to see the wisdom of including cats in such regulations."

They recognize the potential danger of a rabies epidemic—especially since the spread of rabies in wildlife has now reached South Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia—namely in the skunk, raccoon and fox populations.

"The whole mission of rabies control," Dr. Freeman pointed out, "is to protect people. The only way we have of doing that is through the protection of those animals most likely to bite man—dogs and cats."

The problem now is in the wildlife species, but it can (and usually does) go from wildlife to man. Very few people are bitten by wildlife and those that are get immediate medical help. On the other hand, many people are bitten by their pets," the Veterinarian added.

Dr. Freeman notes that the problem now is with cats—they are not included in the current rabies statute. Although seven counties and two cities have seen fit to pass their own ordinances requiring that cats be immunized against rabies, his mission is to get the whole state covered.

"My feeling is that if we are serious about protecting people against rabies, we have to extend our law to include cats as well as dogs," Dr. Freeman reasoned. "We are doing a fairly good job of protecting the dog population against rabies. But there are just about as many cats as there are dogs and the frequency of bites is approximately the same. And we know that cats can transmit rabies." Dr. Freeman said most of the flack against including cats in a rabies immunization bill came last session from members of the Agriculture Committee. Their argument was that most farmers have a big population of cats around the barnyard and that they would be hard to catch.

But the public health specialist feels the real argument is that the legislators are hesitant to impose an additional regulation on their constituents.

"I do not buy that argument at all," Dr. Freeman bristled. "We are about the business of protecting people against a horrible, deadly disease and, in that regard, I do not think that kind of thinking is in the best interest of the people legislators represent. One cat with rabies can infect a whole herd of dairy cattle—causing thousands of dollars in damage to one farmer. It has happened in other states and it can happen in North Carolina. But, aside from that, it is the probable danger to people that worries me.

"If I did not think the inclusion of cats in the rabies control law of this state was in the best interest of the farmer, his family, livestock and the people who live in the area, I would not be promoting it," Dr. Freeman said. "And, I repeat, the only way we have of doing an effective job of that is to protect the domestic animals with which people most often come in contact—and that includes cats."

Coffee Won't Help Drinker 'Sober Up'

One of the most common myths about drinking alcohol is that coffee, a cold shower, or exercise will help a drinker "sober up."

The North Carolina Medical Society says black coffee, cold showers, and exercise do not erase the bio-chemical effects of alcohol. Approximately 85-90 of the alcohol a drinker consumes is oxidized by the liver.

Only time and the action of the liver will burn off the alcohol and render the drinker reasonably sober.

Never drink and drive. It is a deadly misconception to think that you have to be "drunk" before you become a dangerous driver.

Even at a level of .05 percent blood alcohol content (half the legal limit in N.C.), a driver is twice as likely to have an accident then if driving sober.

If you plan to drink, make arrangements to have a sober person drive you home, or plan to spend the night where you are.

If you plan to drink during or after the holidays, keep these points in mind:

—Know your limit and stick to it. If two drinks is your limit, stick to that.

—Eat something before, during and after drinking. This slows the rate at which alcohol is absorbed into the blood stream, and it will slow the alcohol's effect on the drinker.

—Beware of unfamiliar drinks. You may not know the potency or proof of the alcoholic beverage.

—And again, never drink and drive. Alcohol does impair your judgement and coordination.
