Quincy Highlights

Local Reading Methods

An upcoming episode of "Quincy," the NBC TV show starring Jack Klugman as a county medical examiner, highlights the Laubach method of reading instruction used by Hoke Reading/Literacy Council in Raeford.

The show, scheduled for broadcast January 26, 10-11 p.m. EST, portrays the plight of the adult functional illiterate in American society and the struggle of one of them, Arnold Chatham, to confront his problem.

According to Barbara Buie, Project Director, the show will bring to public attention the often invisible problem of illiteracy and the response of Laubach volunteers to that problem.

The "Quincy" episode, A Loss of Words, begins when Timothy Hurley, and 18-year-old welder, is killed after he's tricked into lighting his torch in a room full of gas fumes. He couldn't read the plainly worded safety warning signs.

Arnold Chatham, the second illiterate in the story, is an investigator who seeks Quincy's aid in solving the Hurley case. Chatham's illiteracy handicap, which he's hidden for years, is discovered when his long time secretary, Harriet, shares his secret with Quincy.

With Quincy's prodding, Chatham seeks help at a volunteer reading center, and the show ends with Chatham reading his first sentence from a Laubach skillbook.

Peter A. Waite, national director of Laubach Literacy Action, praised NBC and the "Quincy" producers for drawing attention to America's illiteracy crisis and the role of volunteer tutors in confronting the problem.

As part of Laubach's educational programs, Hoke Reading/Literacy Council is one of 640 community-based literacy councils located throughout the United States.

In Hoke County local volunteers trained in the Laubach "Each One Teach One" method offer free one-to-one tutoring.

The local council is asking all citizens to watch this special episode of "Quincy." If you know of an illiterate or functionally illiterate, please encourage him/her to watch.

There is much that must be done if we are to win the war against illiteracy.

WHAT WILL HAPPEN IN 1983

The economy will probably follow one of two paths in 1983. One path will be followed if the Federal Reserve continues its effort to hold down inflation. In this case interest rates will continue the decline they started in 1982 as lenders realize that inflation will continue to be lower. As interest rates fall the economy will slowly revive. Unemployment will fall, but very slowly.

The advantage of this strategy is that the economy will recover but without significantly higher inflation.

The other path will be followed if the Federal Reserve tries to stimulate the economy into rapid recovery in order to quickly lower inflation.

This would be accomplished by the Federal Reserve significantly increasing the growth rate of the money supply - that is, the Federal Reserve would pump a lot of money into the economy.

The credit markets would initially interpret this policy as meaning a greater availability of credit, and, hence, interest rates would fall significantly.

This would lead to a temporary "boom" in the economy and a rapid decline in unemployment.

However, eventually the rapid monetary growth would lead to higher inflation and even higher interest rates - that is, a repetition of the late 1970's.

The first possible path for 1983, in which the Federal Reserve maintains its anti-inflation policy and the economy recovers slowly, is the best path for the long-run health of the economy.

If that path is followed, the stage should be set for a period of economic growth without rapid inflation. Under this policy, the economy will not be booming in 1983, but it will be improving.
