

Changing County's Phones Gathers 'Little Interest'

Some Hoke County residents living on other area routes are having to dial long distance for county services in the Raeford area.

The reason for this stems from the boundary lines of the phone companies, Carolina Telephone and Telegraph Division Commercial Supervisor Mickey McDowell said Tuesday.

Area residents living at Rt. 1, Pine Bluff, Aberdeen, Red Springs or Wagram, must call long distance to get any type of service from the Hoke area.

"We go by boundary lines and not county lines. Some of these exchanges are not even serviced by the Carolina Telephone company," McDowell said.

Despite the different exchanges, area residents can call Hoke and Raeford for emergency services without the long distance expense.

According to McDowell, area residents needing emergency service should dial the operator and ask for Zenith 5111.

This allows for a collect call at no charge to the customer, McDowell said.

"In the past there has been a small amount of interest in getting a countywide extended area service hook-up, but nothing ever came of it," McDowell said.

The countywide service hook up would allow residents to call Raeford at no additional long distance charge, but basic rates would increase.

That only creates more problems for other residents who do not wish to have the countywide service, McDowell said.

People living in Red Springs, for instance, would have to pay the additional basic rate increase for Hoke residents to call Raeford.

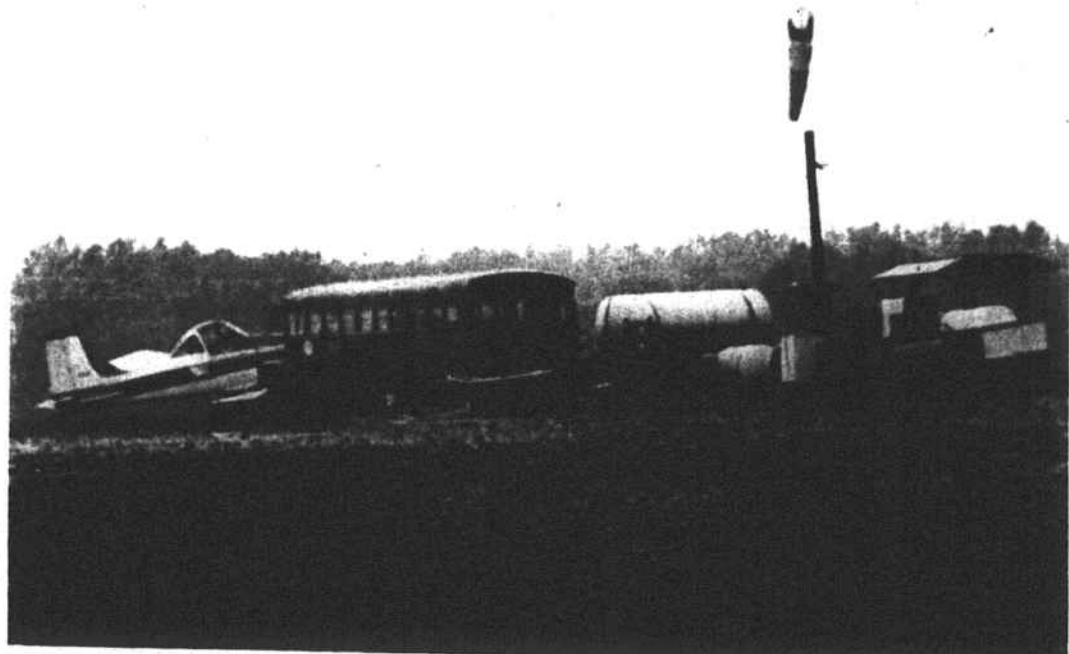

"That does not help support for this service," McDowell said.

McDowell also adds that most residents in these areas prefer getting countywide service to larger towns such as Lumberton and Southern Pines.

"The community of interest tends to favor extended service in larger towns rather than the Raeford area," McDowell said.

In order to get the county extended service, members of the community and local government leaders must show "sufficient" interest.

If enough people show they want and need the service then the telephone company takes the matter to the North Carolina Utilities Commission in Raleigh.

Raising Herbs Can Be Easy

Fresh herbs for garnishing everything from salads to main dishes can be as close as the backyard garden, or even the kitchen window box.

Once confined mainly to decorative gardens or commercial farms, herb growing is gaining renewed popularity among home gardeners, says Dr. Brian M. Lawrence, director of research and development for the Avoca Division of RJR Technical Company, a unit of R.J. Reynolds Development Corp.

Many commonly used herbs are hardy plants that can easily be grown in outdoor gardens or indoor planters, says Lawrence, whose work focuses primarily on the business of growing aromatic plants including commonly known herbs.

The Avoca Division of RJR Technical Company grows the only U.S. commercial crop of clary sage from which clary sage oil and sclareol are obtained.

Clary sage oil is sold to perfume houses where it is used primarily in men's fragrance formulations. Sclareol, because of its unique chemical structure, is used as the starting point for the manufacture of a fixative, which has wide use in the fragrance industry.

"The popular interest in growing herbs reflects overall changing attitudes on eating healthy, natural foods," Lawrence says. "People are more interested in eating natural, wholesome foods, and that includes using fresh herbs grown in their own gardens as flavorings."

Although most herbs are undemanding plants, close attention to growing conditions can assure flavorful, bountiful yields, says Lawrence, who also is scientific editor of the international publication, Perfumer and Flavorist.
