Each of the North Carolina hospitals will be managed by a new management team provided by Healthcare Services of America, Inc., (HSA), a corporation organized to own and operate psychiatric hospitals nationwide.

Hoke Agricultural Extension News

by Willie Featherstone, Jr.
Agricultural Extension Agent

Conventional row width soybeans (30"-48") have been traditionally sampled for corn earworm with a standard three foot "beat sheet" ("shaker cloth"). This popular device has worked well and allowed the use of insecticides on an as needed basis. However, the "beat sheet" does not work adequately on soybeans of 21", or less, row widths.

Consequently, recent research has developed two sampling devices that work satisfactorily on narrow row soybeans. These sampling devices are (1) the rigid beat cloth (RBC) and (2) the sweep-net (SWP).

Rigid Beat Cloth - The RBC works on the same principle as a standard beat sheet but is not flexible; this allows positioning of the RBC into the soybeans at a 45° angle. Construction is of light wood and screen wire and the device is simply a shallow sided box. Dimensions are 3' x 2' with 3" sides.

Sides and the bottom can be made from 1/4" exterior plywood with a screen insert in the bottom and 1/4 round molding for bracing or sides may be made from 1" x 3" boards, with corner braces, and the bottom made entirely of screen wire. A screen door pull or similar handle is secured on one three foot side for carrying. The RBC is carried like a briefcase.

Sweep-net - The SWP has been used for many years in several crops for sampling insects. For narrow row soybeans a very sturdy and rigid SWP of 15" hoop diameter is necessary; butterfly type insect nets are totally useless.

Each SWP sample is comprised of 15 net sweeps. Each sweep consists of a brisk thrust of the net along a straight line (approximately 42") in front of the scout and perpendicular to the rows.
