SCOUT MESS HALL "BEFORE AND AFTER"

Dining room and kitchen of the Piedmont Boy Scout camp at Tryon before the fire August 20. Here more than ten thousand meals were served each summer. Building was 36 feet by 96 feet and fully equipped in most modern way. Boats and canoes were stored in loft of building during the winter.

Fire, originating in the kitchen, completely destroyed the mess hall, one of the finest camp buildings in the South. The loss was only partially covered by insurance. Plans are being made now to replace this hall with a new and larger building in keeping with the expanded facilities of the camp.

SUCCESSFUL PARENTHOOD

SELECTING CHILDREN'S

Here is a letter which I am sure many of us have felt at times tempted to write. The writer signs herself "Neighbor" and she says: "Would you say something about the importance of children's clothes to his peace of mind? I see the youngsters going by my house on the way to school and it honestly seems to me as if their behavior is dictated by their clothes! Of course, I really don't mean that—but I have been able to divide them into two or three classes. First, there are the over-dressed ones who lord it all over the others and are so conscious of themselves and their finery that I wonder if they ever have a really free childish impulse to have a good time. They there are the sloppy dressed ones—clothes too big or too little, buttons off, shoe laces knotted—they either look miserable or try to hide their discomfort by being noisy and hard booted. And then most pitiful of all, are the ones who have to wear freakish clothes to express their parents' personalities—something "arty" perhaps. These youngsters simply crawl into themselves and stay out of the way of the other boys and girls and their jibes.

The child who is dressed conspicuously or inappropriately, is certainly ill at ease. And it is true that from this feeling of being uncomfortable all sorts of behavior problems and difficulties may arise. So in selecting your child's clothes keep the following points in mind: Season is one of the first considerations.

the garment must be appropriate to the time of year. Next comes consideration of the practical features of any given garment—is there room for the free play of the muscles? Is the garment easy to put on and take off? The quality of workmanship is important, too, for a thrown-together garment won't last long on an active child.

Always try to incorporate a new fashion note, nothing extreme but something that will be individual and interesting. Growing children like many changes. Also they are developing ideas about clothes. Don't try to curb their tastes too much. It is often surprisingly good. Confidence in one's appearance means a lot in life, and children should be given the assurance that comes from self-selected clothes. Clothing does not need to be expensive in order to be in good taste. Rather it is a matter of spending time studying your child's type with an eye also to what his friends are wearing, so he won't look too different from the others.

The complaint of many mothers that their children fail to take good care of their clothes, and for that reason don't deserve nice ones, should be applied in reverse. Often the feeling that his clothes are unattractive is back of a child's careless handling of them—he can take out his disappointment on a despised coat when he can't on the mother who thoughtlessly bought a color the child didn't like. Of course, play comes first with children, as it should, and clothes are apt to get rough treatment. But it is rarely that you are justified in saying that a child has deliberately ruined a garment. Children grow fond of their clothes if they are becoming and are truly sorry when accidents happen.

As for hand-me-downs, these are an economic necessity in most families especially in these days of shortages. But you can always add a touch which makes a garment the second child's own—a new feather for a hat costs only a quarter, a clever shoulder pin makes sister's suit more palatable, and a brand new blouse or sweater can make it seem a new costume.

Indeed there is plenty of room for imagination and ingenuity in planning children's clothes. Many clever mothers have turned this knack into a successful career.
