DALE CARNEGIE Author of "How to Win Friends and Influence People"

IGNORE THE SCOFFERS

Have you ever started something you wished very much to do and then had somebody croak, "You'll fail. It can't be done"?

That's the very time to plunge ahead, for almost everyone in the world who ever started anything worth while has had some one tell him that he couldn't succeed. A young English inventor had an idea. It was to work out a method of propelling a ship without depending upon the wind. Finally, he hit upon the screw propeller, and took a model to the British Admiralty. The wise lords, who knew all about ships, looked at it and said, "It's impractical. You can't put the propelling power of a ship at the end. It must be in the middle." The inventor's name was John Ericsson. Now all ships are propelled by a screw at the end where the wise lords said it wouldn't work.

A woman in Chicago needed money. The idea came to her that she could make candy and sell it. She told her friends about it. The same old chorus: "It can't be done. You'll fail."

But she bought some sugar and eggs, and made candy on her cookstove, and sold it. She sold $1.20 worth, and the next day she made some more.

"It can't last," the chorus said. "Better give it up before you lose what money you have."

But Mrs. Ora H. Snyder kept on. You've heard of her candy stores in Chicago, Ill., Oak Park and Evanston.

What would have happened to the young mechanic working in an abandoned Methodist church in Santa Ana, Calif., if he had paid attention to such croakings? This foolish young man had an idea that he could build a machine that would fly. So he rented a church, ripped out the door, put in a big entrance, and started to work. People laughed. They scoffed. Why, it took a genius to build an airplane—what chance for a boy working in a garage? He let 'em croak while he hammered and pounded and constructed his dream. Later he wheeled a lugubrious thing out the big door—and it flew!

That young man? Glenn L. Martin who builds the China Clippers!

And so it goes. If you have some idea you believe in, don't listen to the croaking chorus. Listen only to what your own inner voice tells you!

Successful Parenthood BY MRS. CATHERINE CONRAD EDWARDS Associate Editor, Parents' Magazine

DON'T MAKE CHILDREN FEEL UNWORTHY How can you correct a child's mistakes and help him overcome his faults without making him feel that you dislike him? That is the knotty question we promised to ponder at the end of our last week's article on the importance of letting a child know he is liked as well as loved. To illustrate what not to do, we'll describe an incident which we encountered recently. Standing in front of his house was a boy eight or nine years old looking dejected and a little scared. His mother was on the porch pouring water from a pan in one hand and wiping up a spot of dirt with the other. In a very angry voice she was saying "You don't need to stand there looking so innocent. I saw you! I guess I know who tracked this dirt onto the porch. Somebody who doesn't care how much work I have to do. I was watching—I saw you!"

What she was really saying to the child through her aggrieved manner was, "What did I ever do to deserve such a mean, ungrateful son?" Of course the child couldn't translate her grievance correctly—all he could feel was that his mother resented and disliked him. Now was the mother supposed to say nothing because the boy made extra work for her by tracking mud on the porch? Or course not. For one thing it wouldn't be fair to the child to let him grow up to make himself a burden to others. Besides a mother isn't supposed to be a slave for her children. But her approach was all wrong. To begin with she read into the misdeed a lot of things that weren't there. She implied that the boy purposely tracked up the porch for the pleasure he would get in seeing her scrub it. That is nonsense. A child may long to take revenge on an adult, but it is more apt to be expressed in planning to run away so the adult will be sorry. The mother was also accusing the boy of intending to lie by the emphasis she put on having spied on him. Here, then, because of a thoughtless act, was a child assailed by accusations of lying, meanness, and lack of love for his mother. And all the time, mind you, the mother was scrubbing up the mud herself.

Wouldn't it have been better to bring the pan of water and cloth to the porch, call the boy and say, "Sonny, you tracked mud on the clean porch. Take this rag and wipe it off—and do a good job. And try to remember the next time to clean your feet before you step on the porch. This is your house as well as mine and we want it to look well cared for." True, Sonny may try to talk his mother out of cleaning up after himself. But she can be firm—making him see that the neighborhood, as well as she herself expects porches to be kept clean and that those who bring in unnecessary dirt have to clean it off. There's nothing in this attitude to make the child feel disliked or weighed down with guilt—but it leaves no doubt in his mind that carelessness costs you more trouble in the end than thinking beforehand. In other words, discipline should consist of teaching a child the right way, not in making him feel unworthy.

CUTTING COLTON STALKS WILL BE A BLOW TO BOLL WEEVIL. RALEIGH, Oct. 18.—Destruction of cotton stalks before frost will cut off the boll weevil's food supply and send him into winter quarters in a weakened condition. J. Myron Maxwell, State College Extension entomologist, declared here Saturday. "If the stalks are destroyed the weevil will have no squares and bolls on which to feed. He will not have the opportunity of building up a food supply but will go into the winter hungry and weak. Under this condition a much larger number of weevils will die during the winter freezes and there will be fewer weevils next spring," Maxwell said. In destroying the stalks he suggested that the grower use any type of implement which he found best suited to the job. The earlier the stalks are destroyed, the hungrier and weaker the boll weevil will be when he goes into winter quarters under trash, in hedge rows, and into the woods for cover. Conservation of electricity is essential to victory because it means saving coal, oil or gas used to produce it. War expenditures of the United States government September amounted to $1,212,000,000—a daily average of $277,400,000. This was slightly less than the August figures, and above July costs.

More repair parts for domestic washing machines will be available soon. WPBs Office of Civilian Requirements (OCR) reports. A recent order permits manufacture of certain parts made of copper—thousands of domestic washing machines are in demand for tankers and merchant vessels and in seamen organizations overseas.
