NORTH The saying, "East is east and west is west and never the twain shall meet" might well be applied to elections in our country by substituting the words north and south. There have been exceptions. In 1928, Florida, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Texas and Virginia all backed Herbert Hoover against Alfred Smith. But in practically every other election since the South supported Grant in 1872, it has been a foregone conclusion that the Republican candidate starts the race by spotting his opponent of the 124 electoral votes of the 11 states referred to as the solid South. In addition to the 5 states named above, the other members of this group are Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina. To keep the record straight, Oklahoma did vote Republican

'WAR-IS-OVER' OPTIMISM There is nothing new in the fact that people on the winning side of a war relax their efforts when everything seems to be going well. This habit is as old as history and has lost many a campaign and a number of wars. Napoleon credited much of his success to the fact that he was able to keep his armies, and the citizens back home, on the qui vive up until the time victory was actually won. When the United States entered this present war, most everyone—except the Germans, M. Laval, Mr. Quisling and a few others—believed the United Nations would win both against Germany and against Japan, and today it looks as though the German phase was on the point of being successfully concluded. In fact, failure does not appear possible with our forces driving through France from two directions and with Russia hammering successfully on the Eastern front. But in 1918 the Germans were smashing again toward the Marne and the future looked black in the capitals of France, England and America. The Russians were out of the war and the Kaiser was concentrating his combined forces in what seemed a "non-stop" advance on the Western front. The United States had not yet landed a sufficient number of men to be able to turn the tide; although certain American regiments near the Marne were vitally effective in slowing the German advance, for which the American army has never received proper credit. Then—with great suddenness and with much fanfare—supposedly Communist inspired strikes occurred in many of the munitions factories of Germany. These strikes were put down immediately and drastically, but the harm had been done. The whole morale of the German army seemed to crack, based to a great extent on the feeling that if the home front cared so little for the men who were fighting their battles, then there wasn't much use their sacrificing their lives further. On the other hand, the Allied forces became inspired by the crack in the German morale and before many months the war came to a victorious end for our side. It isn't claimed by historians that these nation-wide strikes were the sole agency responsible for the German collapse, but there is no doubt in the minds of many that the result might have been very different had not this one seemingly comparatively unimportant incident occurred. This is just one of the many cases in the history of warfare which proves that a war is not over until it is won. A very recent example of the so-called "war is over" optimism was a report from the Brooklyn, N.Y., Red Cross Blood Donor center that cancellations of appointments for blood donations in one day were about 164 out of 564. (And this occurs, unfortunately, at a time when there will be more and more wounded Americans in need of plasma.) Another illustration is the spread of strikes—strikes which will delay the construction of submarines upon which we depend to whittle down the Japanese merchant marine upon which they in turn depend for the life lines to the various nations which they have conquered since the start of the war; strikes which actually have prevented much blood plasma reaching our wounded men at the front; strikes in munition plants, seemingly all over the country; strikes which the authorities allow to occur partially for the reason that they too consider the war practically over. One thing we can be sure of: in ratio, as the Allied home fronts relax, the enemy home fronts will redouble their exertions.

From where I sit... by Joe Marsh What Made Our Invasion a Success? With 57 blue stars on our Service Flag, our town's been mighty excited over the way things are progressing on the Continent. "Shucks," says Bob Newcomb happily, "I knew we were going to lick them Nazis, soon as the Invasion started." "I knew it before that," says Doc Hollister. "I knew it from the way our boys were getting along with their British buddies in those English camps. They had a lot of differences to overcome before they could work together as a team. And they overcame 'em."

in 1920, giving Harding a small majority, and Louisiana supported Hays in 1876. I believe that covers all exceptions since the election of President Grant. In the northern camp there has been greater fluctuation—which was most evident in 1936 when all but two states—Vermont and Maine—voted for Roosevelt. Vermont is the only state in the nation which has never voted Democratic, Maine having ventured into the Democratic fold in 1912 when, because of a split in the Republican ticket, that state gave a plurality to Wilson. PROTESTS I have recently been studying a poll on the coming election. It seems safe to say that the South will once again stand solidly behind the Democratic candidate. There has been considerable rebellion against the New Deal in some quarters of the South, but not enough to indicate much probability of Mr. Dewey getting any of the 124 electoral votes which President Roosevelt has carried in his vest pocket ever since he went into the White House. One southerner queried in this poll said, "Nine out of ten of the people here are condemning the New Deal but they'll still vote for Roosevelt when they go to the polls." Another said, "The Democrats who object to the New Deal will not protest by voting for a Republican. If they protest at all, it will be by staying away from the polls."

The election totals show that, although the South has been "in the bag" for the Democrats in most every election year, the one-party tradition is not to the liking of a good many southerners. It may be a long time before the South will support a Republican ticket, but it is quite possible that a Republican by any other name might attract a good portion of the southern vote. INDEPENDENTS 25% As for the North, which is traditionally Republican, there has been considerable shifting back and forth. There is much less of the sectional loyalty to party displayed in the South. But there are many towns in the North which always have given almost
