Roanoke River Above Flood Stage, Rising

WELDON, Sept. 20. — The Roanoke river, already 14 feet above flood stage, is expected to reach 45 feet or more at Weldon by Thursday night, weather officials said.

Residents of low-lying areas along the river, which is swollen by heavy rains of the past two days, were warned today to take every precaution and to be prepared to evacuate to the higher ground if necessary.

A report issued from the Virginia highway department this morning said that U. S. highway 501 at South Boston, Va., will be closed about six or seven o'clock this evening. Also U. S. Highway 15 at Clarksville and U. S. No. 1 between Norlina and South Hill are expected to be closed at nine or ten o'clock tonight.

Trains Out Officials of the Southern Railway at Raleigh said their trains were still out between Greensboro and Charlottesville, and that they were operating on detour routes.

Present indications led to a mark reached in the disastrous flood of 1940 would not be repeated this year.

Two hundred and ten highway bridges were reported washed out over rivers and streams in Virginia.

RICHMOND, Va., Sept. 20.— A 26-foot flood on the James river, one of the worst in years, was expected to reach Richmond tonight.

Danville reported today there was no damage to property in that city from the flood in the Dan river, and the river was falling after having reached a 12-foot crest.

State highway officials expected highways near Clarksville and South Hill in south side Virginia would be covered by flood waters tonight. The towns themselves are not expected to suffer damage from the high waters in the Roanoke river, since they occupy comparatively high locations.

The crest at Richmond was expected at about 9 P. M. Weather bureau officials said a previous prediction of a crest of 27 feet was probably a little high, because the waters are flattening out somewhat after the peak level had passed Columbia.

American Railroads Awarded Harriman Safety Medal

There are many people these days who pay tribute to the Seaboard Railway and the other American Railroads by remarking that these carriers are doing a magnificent war-time job. And so they are. With less equipment and fewer men, the railroads have handled much greater volumes of freight and twice the number of passengers in World War II than in the "over there" days of 1917-18.

About 1,250,000 members of the armed forces in organized groups are moved by rail each month and this figure does not include the millions of G. I. Joes and Sailor Macs who travel on furloughs or under individual orders.
