Successful Parenthood BY MRS. CATHERINE CONRAD EDWARDS Associate Editor, Parents Magazine

WINTER NEED OF FISH OIL

Happily we do not have to say goodbye to the sun in winter, but with its rays reaching us from a greater distance we do have to make up for the weaker vitamin D building power of the sun. This we have learned how to do in true Eskimo fashion by taking fish oils in which this priceless health-protecting vitamin has been stored.

A baby needs extra vitamin D by the time he is two weeks old, summer and winter both. But he isn't yet equipped with reflexes for swallowing except when receiving food through a nipple (this is nature's way of keeping solids from entering the baby's stomach), so that cod liver oil by spoon will be pushed out of the mouth with his tongue. Since the oil leaves a stain, start baby's lessons at bath time when any spillage can be wiped off without harm to clothing.

Use a medicine dropper to give the oil for the first few weeks. Hold the baby's head up a little, drop the oil in the corner of his mouth, then close his lips with your fingers so the oil won't get onto his chin, and wait for him to swallow. Do not put the oil into the back of his mouth or he may choke.

Keep the dropper clean by putting it back into the bottle as soon as you have used it. Or, if the dropper doesn't fit into the bottle, put it into a glass of hot soapy water at once. If the oil is given time to dry you won't be able to clean the dropper later on. Dried oil becomes rancid and taints the fresh oil if a soiled dropper is used.

When the baby learns to swallow the oil, you can begin giving it with a spoon. The amount and the type of product for your child should be specified by your doctor.

Among the rules that many pediatricians give mothers in the early months of a baby's life is to say "Smile, when you give the baby his cod-liver oil!" At the time, it may seem rather silly, since the baby is too young to see the smile. But it does get the mother herself in the way of feeling that cod-liver oil is an unpleasant happening, and gradually the baby absorbs the attitude.

However, things don't always go smoothly, even when one has smiled hard and hidden any personal feeling about fish oil. Sometimes older children sense that this oil is important to the mother and will try refusing it in order to test her reaction. It is far better not to force the issue but simply to say, "Well, it won't hurt to skip your oil for a day or two if you feel like it. You know that it helps you to grow, so you tell me when you are ready for it again." Then, if the child doesn't make any move, the mother can casually suggest, a day or two later, that he may have forgotten about it, and that perhaps he would like to get the bottle of oil himself.

As in many other situations which arise between mother and child it is better first to try cooperation and putting part of the responsibility on the child. However, cod liver oil is sufficiently important to justify a showdown if the situation has got out of hand. If the child's like is genuine you may have to compromise on a synthetic product that does not have the fish taste or smell. But if it is just a battle of wills, then with the greatest good humor and casualness set about winning it. You can, you know, if you don't lose your temper. For the child soon senses that your persistence is for his good and not a mere show of authority.

THAT THING CALLED PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION

We Americans will try anything once. We have already taken flyers on flagpole sitting, Frank Sinatra, jitterbugging, banana splits, Billy Sunday, zoot suits and open-toed shoes for gathering athlete's foot germs. At the present moment we are excelling in a new indoor sport called "Progressive Education" which by and large makes flagpole sitting seem by comparison a sort of higher form of learning. This progressive education is aptly named, it progresses rapidly—but backward instead of forward.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, the president of Columbia University—and no reactionary himself—declares that this doctrine, if carried to an extreme, would put the child back in the Garden of Eden to begin all over again the life of civilized man.

The scintillating philosophy behind this new departure from our already backward system of education, is that youth—if allowed to go his own way unmolested and uncorrected—will develop a sort of glittering individuality which may land him in the already fully occupied seats of the mighty, or in direct competition with Superman.

There seem to be quite a number of requisites to the above accomplishments: The student shall study only those subjects which please his "mature" fancy. If he doesn't want to study anything—that is theoretically O. K. too. He must not be made to do anything he doesn't want to—such as brush his teeth, clean his ears or take an occasional bath. If he likes smoking or drinking at the ripe old age of ten—it must be "personality" cropping out. Above all he must not be corrected as to manners, morals or deportment. If he er; and if he feels like spitting on the floor it may ruin his future if he is corrected.

It's a grand system. It will make its pupils shine in any gathering. How proud we will be some day when one of our representatives at some great international conference held in the palace at Versailles tells the other members to "go take a jump in the river!" What a glorious day in our history when some future incoming president of the United States trips the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court as that eminent official is administering the Oath of Office. How magnificent an international gesture when some future Secretary of State crowns some visiting potentate with a nice ripe custard pie.

Ah me—how times do change. Once we thought it polite and gracious to bring teacher a nice red apple. When we are progressively educated, we will doubtless "give her the raspberry," thinks his father is an old horse—and some fathers are old horses
