WHAT IS TAKING PLACE BY

Robert R. Reynolds

UNITED STATES SENATOR

As I pause in a swing across the state to dictate this column, it is becoming more and more evident that the effort to draft new farm legislation when Congress convenes will be marked by a sharp controversy over whether there shall be direct subsidies to agriculture or production control. Each of the two plans has many supporters. The action of the agriculture commissioners from ten

Southern states in approving the subsidy idea is significant.

Those opposed to production control contend, and with merit to their contentions, that weather and pest conditions cannot be controlled and enter strongly into the situation. They argue that if there is production control, drought or heavy rainfall, pests or some other emergency can wipe out all the gains made through crop shortages. Moreover, it is always difficult to get all farmers to agree to production control.

In industry, it is claimed, when some industrial plants are faced with a slow-down in production, others speed-up and take advantage of that situation. The same holds true for agriculture and in many cases production control does not work evenly.

The tour of members of the Senate Committee on Agriculture through the farm belts will undoubtedly develop much information as to what the farmers want. One suggestion already made, in connection with cotton, is that the price be pegged with regard to domestic consumption and that the surplus be "dumped into the world markets. It is rightly claimed that to carry through such a plan would require tariff changes to prevent an influx of cheap goods from abroad made from the "dumped" American cotton.

Many veteran Senators who have spent years with the problems of agriculture always in their mind, are strongly opposed to production control.

In fact, the disagreement over production control as proposed in administration measures introduced at the last session of Congress had much to do with preventing the enactment of a new farm program. But in the end the law will probably be framed on the basis of what the farmers themselves and the leaders of farm organizations want. To ascertain this is the purpose of the field studies of the Senate committee.

Many Congressional leaders recognize that with a short session generally favored, due to the 1938 elections, it would be extremely difficult to start in on what is generally described as "tariff tinkering." This fact alone, some contend, may help swing support toward production control for the present, with more permanent legislation to be drafted later.

Tariff changes—despite the fact that there is a great need for better protection for the farmer—have always been one of the most controversial legislative questions. Thus to open tariff debate in the next session, along with the prospects of new tax legislation, might throw Congress into a muddle worse than that of the last session.

However, one thing now seems certain. When Congress convenes, whether in special or regular session, a farm program will be ready. It is not inconceivable that a compromise of some fashion will be reached between those who oppose production control and those who favor this method of meeting the farm situation. Some dissatisfaction over the nine-cent loan on cotton may have an influence on any new farm bill.

From the standpoint of the farmer, these controversies are hopeful signs. They mean that there is real interest in the farm problem and that it is daily winning more attention. And there is agreement that the farmer cannot have any assurance of economic stability as conditions are today.
