Bronze Plaque In Honor of Mrs. Anna Hodgin Hanes

This handsome bronze plaque, shown above, is located in the entrance to the new addition to Hugh Chatham Memorial Hospital on the second floor, in honor of Mrs. Anna Hodgin Hanes, of Winston-Salem, widow of the late John W. Hanes. Mrs. Hanes has contributed liberally to all the hospital buildings, and was the largest single contributor to the new addition.

tions, but at least one didn't make it. His mother called from Huntsville to report him in a hospital suffering from an appendicitis attack.

A Negro woman, who cooks for a Kilby Prison official, telephoned from Birmingham she missed a bus and couldn't make the reporting deadline, but added: "I'm on my way." One man called from Memphis, because he missed a bus and would be "30 minutes late."

Jim Germany, a Negro who hobbles on legs off at the knees, got in well ahead, reporting at 3 o'clock this afternoon. He caught a ride from Tuskegee.

Many of the men brought packages back—a lot of left-over Christmas goodies and knick-knacks—for the boys who didn't get out.

TO

Hugh Chatham Memorial Hospital

UPON THE FORMAL OPENING OF ITS

Modern New Addition

We Are Proud of This Enlarged Institution and Fully Realize Its Importance to This Section

As in all really modern buildings, electricity plays a major role at Hugh Chatham Memorial Hospital, both in the original plant and in the three-story new addition. The building is well lighted and numerous electrical outlets have been provided. We are also proud of the fact that six cabinet Kelvinators are used in the main hospital building, and another Kelvinator is part of the equipment of the Nurses' home. Hospital officials knew that Kelvinators could be depended upon to provide safe, economical refrigeration year in and year out.
