TWO SIDES
To Every Question
By LITTLE HULL

Democracy—Dictator troubles are occupying the centre of the stage today for the reason that their outcome may affect every individual in the civilized world. There is another struggle going on in which the world is interested but which, for the moment at least, vitally affects a comparatively small proportion of its inhabitants. This struggle centers around the Zionist movement in Palestine.

Volumes are required to give even an idea of the vast ramifications of Jewish and Arab claims based upon the historical past, but a few words might suffice to convey a rough outline of the present disagreements.

In the early days of the Great War it was recognized by England and France that an Arab revolt against their Turkish rulers would make it possible to drive the Turks out of Arabia and greatly help the strategic position of the Entente. In order to bring about this revolt, negotiations were entered into with Sherif Hussein of Mecca, one of the most influential leaders in Arabia.

On October 24, 1915, a letter—known as the McMahon note—was dispatched to Hussein. This note stated that the British government would guarantee to uphold the independence of the Arabs in the greater portion of the Arabian Peninsula—at the conclusion of the war. The guarantee excepted certain districts, but these exceptions did not include Palestine. On the strength of this agreement, the Arabs revolted and joined arms with England and her Allies. Thus ended the first chapter.

In the spring of 1916, an arrangement, known as the Sykes-Picot agreement, was entered into secretly by England, France and Russia. It agreed, in effect, to divide between those nations—at the conclusion of the war—control of the greater part of Northern Arabia. The terms of this treaty conflicted with some of the conditions upon which the Arabs had agreed to join the Allies.

When the Bolsheviks gained control in Russia, they exposed the terms of this secret treaty, and the Arabs demanded an explanation. The British Foreign Office was able to convince Hussein that this expose was primarily the work of German-Turkish propagandists—and the Arabs were appeased. So ended the second chapter.

On October 2nd, 1917, appeared the famous Balfour Agreement. Whether or not this agreement is a binding guarantee of a National Homeland for the Zionists in Palestine is the much discussed question of today, but it is certain that the Zionist leaders were induced to so consider it, and on the strength of that conviction threw in their lot with the Entente Allies. And thus begins the most tragic chapter of them all.

It is stated—and with some reason—that in time of war there may be justification for sharp trading, but Zionist and Arab feel that the British Government carried on these negotiations in a manner, and for a purpose, which even the exigencies of war cannot excuse.

They contend that England was determined to get a stranglehold on Palestine which would add greatly to her strategic position in that part of the world, both during and after the war, and that she allowed nothing to stand in the way of her accomplishment. They don't hold the English people, as such, responsible, but fasten the blame upon the British Government which they accuse not only of deceiving Jew and Arab, but of keeping their own people in ignorance of their policy.

England now controls regions in Arabia which, according to the terms of the McMahon agreement, should belong unreservedly to the Arab state, and the world feels that there was no excuse for inducing the Zionists to believe they were to have a National Homeland in Palestine, if there was any justice in the Arabs' claim that Palestine had already been promised to them.

The sacrifices made by both Jew and Arab, based on their faith in the honest intent of the British Government, are beyond computation. The righteous rage of these two people has already caused terrific loss to life and property, and is to be reckoned with for years to come.

At the Eastern extremity of the Mediterranean, there festers a horrid sore. If, and how, it will ever be cured no one knows. The recent pronouncement of the British Government, which is intended to make of Palestine an Arab controlled state with a fixed Jewish minority, is a Jewery who believed they had found a haven at last, and late reports indicate that he Arabs also do not favor the terms of this British White Paper.
