The Adventures of a Diamond. Char eston News and Courier.

The latest authentic story concerning the famous Orioff diamond, which forms the great ornament of the Russian crown and which has been more or less described of late by enthusiastic correspondents, is perhaps the best of all. According to this account, which is vouched for by a descendant of one of its former owners, the diamond in its rough state formed one of the eyes of an idol in a temple near Trichnipoli, in Madras, India. A French soldier stole it and, not succeeding in getting beyond Persia with it, sold it to a Jew merchant for £2,000. The Shah of Persia merchant for £2,000. The Shah of Persia discovered the loss and offered a prize for the recovery of the stone and the head of the thief. The Jew, not liking the situation, then sold it to an Armenian merchant, named Shafras, for £12,000. The aim of the Armenian was to get to St. Petersburg with it, knowing that a fine price could be obtained there for his prize. The great difficulty was to get out of Persia with the stone. To test the government officers he pass-To test the government officers he pass-ed the frontier several times without the stone and each time he was searched in the most thorough manner. As a last resort he cut an opening in the calf of his leg and inserted the diamond and of his leg and inserted the diamond and sewed up the wound with silver thread. When it had healed he made the journey. As usual he was stripped, bathed, examined from head to foot, dosed with emetics and allowed to go. In St Petersburg, he offered the jewel to Catherine the Great, who had not money enough to pay the sum demanded, $240,000. Thence he went to Amsterdam, where the stone was cut. Count Orloff conceived the notion of presenting his sovereign with the jewel she had not been able to buy, and paid £70,000 for it, besides giving Shafras an annuity of £3,000 a year and a patent of nobility. Orloff kept his word, and Shafras died many years afterwards, an immensely rich man. The present value of the Orloff diamond is estimated at £300,006, or $1,500,000. Those who want to believe the detail concerning Mr Shafras's surgical operation may do so if they see fit.
