He is an epigramatic speaker, and with ringing voice and sharp, incisive utterance, he brought down the house with his wit, saying, "These must be peace times when so many Governors are present." The speech was an eloquent tribute to the bravery of the soldiers of both armies. He made a very significant utterance that as a slave-holder he would declare that but for slavery the Southern country would long ago have been a garden. This utterance he would have deemed disloyal years ago. Now he believed it to be the truth.

Captain W. D. Ellis, of the Atlanta Harris bar, who followed Captain Howell made a short, eloquent speech on the same line.

He was followed by General J. R. Lewis, a one-armed Federal veteran, who now acts as secretary of the exposition company. He spoke in behalf of the Grand Army of the South, and as sured his comrades of the good will of his people.

General Longstreet was next introduced and made a short talk, describing the bravery of the soldiers of the North and South in the Mexican war. He re
