BRESSI'S IMPRISONMENT

The question has been asked as to why Bressi, the anarchist, who assassinated King Humbert at Monza, July 29, was not given the death penalty, but instead was sentenced to life imprisonment. The reason is that capital punishment was definitely abolished in Italy in 1889 and since that time no exception has been made to the edict, even as will be seen, in the case of a dastardly murderer like Humbert's slayer.

The same law obtains in a number of other countries, notably Switzerland. It was in Switzerland that an anarchist assassinated Empress Elizabeth of Austria not many months ago. The murder was even more cold-blooded and cruel than the slaughter of the King of Italy, but under the Swiss statutes the extreme penalty is life time imprisonment and this was imposed upon the culprit.

These two instances illustrate the mistake of abolishing capital punishment. In the case of Bressi when he was sentenced he laughed and haughtily declared: "I await the next revolution." He thus confidently expects to be released from prison when such a revolution comes, if it does come. In a country where there are no gallows the murderer becomes bolder and law breakers have less to fear. He knows that if he is punished his life is not to be taken from him and he has strong hopes of securing liberty through a revolt or by escape. There is but one punishment which befits the crime of assassination and that is an ignominious death at the end of a rope—not a public execution, but a private hanging, where the murderer will have no opportunity to barter a crowd and pose as a martyr.
