A Forgotten Art. It is to be hoped that the good old custom of pedestrianism will not fall into disuse. The bicycle rider has, perhaps, gained more than he has lost, but he has lost something, and that by no means unimportant.

It is a great economic gain to minimize time and distance to so considerable an extent. The enjoyment in this way of the air and exhilaration of easy and rapid motion is delightful, but this sensuous satisfaction is likely to be obtained at the expense of mental stimulus. The bicycle rider cannot tarry to study the tint or texture of the flowers or breathe their fragrance. He cannot listen to the songs of birds or the music of the brooks.

His course is over the world's conventional tracks, and though nature speaks in countless tongues, he hardly catches so much as the echo of any of them. The woodlands and the byways, where lurk the choicest manifestations of beauty, he cannot visit. On his nightly runs he sees only the shining road before him reflecting the light of the moon and stars, but he cannot lift his eyes to the milky way or view the still more glorious tenantry of the heavens.

It does not seem a violent hypothesis that this condition of things must tend to weaken those habits of observation upon which so much that is great in art, science and literature depend, and that this will be deplorably apparent in the next generation, unless some counter interest can be developed. It is a serious question whether a White of Selborne, a Burroughs or a Thoreau could have been produced on an exclusive bicycle basis.

The bicycle interest has come to stay and to grow unless some more potent attraction shall supplant it. But to balance it and prevent social one-sidedness and mental deterioration we need the extension and multiplication of such organizations as the Appalachian club, which will soon start upon an outing, nor to annihilate space, but to become acquainted with the wealth which occupies it, and in acquiring health and strength also to acquire information. It is something to know the world of men, but it is infinitely more important to know intimately the world of nature, for upon that knowledge rests all that man ever has accomplished or ever can accomplish. The fastest scorcher may get to the end of life's journey the soonest, but he will not arrive with as much luggage as the more moderate and observant wayfarer.

Religious Dance of Arabs. Such wonderful stories have been told about the Arab snake dance that I almost forgot that I was a prisoner bound and doomed to heaven knew what, when I had an opportunity of witnessing the performance. It was not quite what I had supposed. Indeed, it was so very different that an account of it will conflict, I'm sure, with any account that I have seen or heard. Here it is: The warriors of one tribe were on their way over the sand to obliterate another tribe for some "cause of blood." It was only an incidental conquest, by the way. They gathered in a gloomy stone chamber, down under a half ruined mosque.

It was evidently quite the proper place for entertainment, for a fire was ready to light in a hole in the corner in the center of the chamber, and a large bamboo basket, with only a small hole at the top, stood on a raised dais at one end. It was covered with a black and white goat skin cloth. When we entered the fire blazed in the center, and most of the Arabs, with savage and gleaming eyes, arranged themselves on rude stone benches about the side walls. Their effies were over their heads, but the points were thrown back, clearly disclosing the features of every face, and in the rope which bound each effie waved a long feather, the badge of the Society of Al-Islam. Their weapons and the green derboukas were prominently held in sinewy Bedouin bands. It was a weird sight, an uncanny corner of the world for one to find himself in, with his legs and arms well bound, a hopeless prisoner.

Suddenly a priest appeared before the basket. The sunlight glinted and gleamed upon his wrinkled yet oily skin as he stood, almost naked, with his hands raised and a maniac grin showing a hideous array of irregular teeth. Every man in the chamber gave a shout as if in a terror and in sympathy if nothing more; a cold chill ran down my back. Solemnly a grim priest chanted a verse from the koran and ten of the warriors threw off their abbas, loosened their girdles, laid down their weapons and derboukas and, almost as naked as the priest, slowly approached the basket. As the first came up the priest lifted the black cloth from the small opening. The Bedouin was silent, but everyone else, in the chamber groaned and began a fearful guttural chant, which never ceased till the end of the ceremony, as, with a shudder, he plunged his naked arm into the hole and slowly drew a huge snake. When the head appeared he made a quick clutch for it with his free hand, then fastening his teeth in the back of the neck close behind the serpent's head and throwing the wriggling body over his shoulder, to twist and coil about his own neck, he folded his arms and bending forward walked slowly toward the fire. Another Bedouin followed him, keeping his eyes upon the snake's head and with a little wand constantly tapping the reptile's nose or putting his own naked hand dangerously close to the ugly fangs, evidently to keep them from turning upon the oheek of the fellow whose teeth were set in the neck. The third man, the fifth, the seventh and the ninth each took a snake from the basket and followed the leader in the name of fasion, never moving their arms, unless in his contortions the creature let the whole weight of his body fall upon their teeth, when they lifted it and threw it again over their shoulders.

Three times the ghastly procession moved slowly about the fire, while the rest chanted their unearthly hymn. By that time the reptiles were quiet, and one by one, with an evident shudder, the naked warriors loosened their teeth and let their burdens drop upon the floor, where they lay with only a contortion now and then, waiting to be gathered and returned to the basket. Then the ten stood erect about the fire. The chantings ceased and all the warriors fell upon their faces. For a moment the only sound in the chamber was a faint crackling of the dying fire and a hiss from one of the reviving snakes. In another instant they all sprang to their feet and, with shouts and yells, began to circle the fire in a grand, hideous bedlam, till all were utterly exhausted, and the snake dance was ended.
