with those who serve them, they could not again command their help. A reputation for a high sense of honor is invaluable to the business man, not merely in providing him with more credit than his capital alone would furnish, but in bringing to him private information of value which would not be entrusted to one who might misuse it.

It is a rule of his conscience not to talk about other people or their affairs, because a violation of that rule might do them an injury. He respects the confidences reposed in him, and hence invites consultations and confessions. The lawyer, physician, editor or banker who establishes a high reputation for honor becomes the repository of secrets which, if disclosed, might bring ruin upon whole communities.
