QUERER COTTON STORY.

A farmer somewhere in Georgia, who runs a story, has raised cotton ten feet high from seed produced somewhere in Africa, on poor land without fertilizer and gathered four bales to the acre.

Several things are very unlikely about this, and some are absurd. Cotton stalks ten feet high and nearly 2,000 pounds of lint to an acre of poor and unfertilized ground are self-evident exaggerations.

We give simply a brief synopsis of the story for the purpose of saying that the seed purports to have been received from Africa. It is no doubt, in our mind, gets to a growth of cotton familiar to Egyptian soil, known as the Bamian variety.

The truth seems to be that Egyptian cotton is given its peculiarities by the Egyptian soil and climate. Hence all attempts to produce this kind of cotton in America, from Egyptian seed, have failed, because we could not bring the climate and soil along with the seed.

The fact is that numerous experiments with Egyptian cotton seed have been made, on our river delta lands and near the coast of the Gulf and Atlantic. Only a few of these encouraged any hope of success, the first year. All failed the second year every one we have had any authentic account of.

Our advice to planters is that, in any degree, excited over such stories as this one from Georgia. They are too improbable to justify serious belief in them.—Tradesman.
