RATS ABOARD SHIPS.

THREE FEROCIOUS SPECIES THAT TRAVEL BY SEA.
The Hage Norway-Rat Generally Drives the English and the Alexandrian Rats Inland—Flies Casanovian Among the Savage Animals.
Nature originally intended that the brown rat should have one pair of feet for the earth and the black rat one pair for the water and the white bellied rodent a third division. While these great nations overlapped each other a little, their boundaries were pretty distinctly fixed by the great oceans and other large bodies of water. A colony of powerful rats might swim across the straits and channels separating two islands and thus take possession of a new country for their descendants, and they could not hope to cross the Atlantic or Pacific and journey unaided from England to America or from this country to Australia.

So it was that the ships of men brought about the first great change in the distribution of rats. From the first the rats took to ships as ducks take to water. They found grain, provisions and water in the hulls of the old wooden ships and in two centuries they had penetrated to every mainland and island of the tropics, temperate and arctic zones. They have become familiar objects on all ships that traverse the seas, and they are the chief cause of the pestilence in temperate regions the English black rat is of a bluish black, but in tropical countries it is often several shades lighter. It is about seven or eight inches long, with tail about one inch longer than its body.

For two centuries this English black rat held undisputed sway on the ships of the world's commercial navies, and they distributed themselves over the greater part of the world's surface. Then gradually there appeared upon the seas another rat, differing materially from the black rat. This alien creature had a black body with a white belly. Sometimes the body was a reddish gray, which made the creature look larger and fiercer than it really was. A trifle larger and stronger than the black rat, the white bellied or Alexandrian rat made war upon the English rodents. The two would never sleep upon the same vessel. There would be a war to the death before the ship left port, and after that the successful race would hold undisputed sway on that particular vessel. This new race of rats came from the tropical countries. Every ship that started from Galapagos, Keeling or Ascension island was sure to carry away with it a company of the white bellied rats. They would board the ship as soon as she was tied up at a wharf, and the English black rats would be ruthlessly destroyed. Then the fiercer Alexandrian rats would sail away to unknown ports. It soon became evident that they liked warm countries, and they refused to land at any except a tropical port. Thus they have spread to nearly all tropical countries, especially in South America and our southern states, leaving the colder countries for their black rat rival.

The most recent third race of rats has appeared upon the ships, and these threaten to exterminate and displace both the black and Alexandrian rodents. This brown or Norway rat is a native of China and the interior of Asia. It is a huge, ferocious creature, and wherever it goes it destroys all competitors and takes complete possession of the ships or wharfs. In the native land it is a large, powerful rodent, and upon the ships it attains even a larger size. Its length is from eight to nine inches, and its body is built on heavy lines. Neither the black nor Alexandrian rat is any match for it. So far this large rodent has not extended its dominion largely over cold countries, and it has come in contact chiefly with the English black rat. But in the warm countries where it has been artificially introduced it has quickly supplanted all rival species.

Today the black rat is not found in numbers on vessels sailing from any ports where the brown or Norway rats have become established. Gradually they are being forced inland by their more powerful rodent rival, and while we find the black rat mostly on ships, along wharfs and in the sewers, the black rats are met with in houses under rafters and eavestroughs. Ships leaving port for a long cruise extending over a period of a year or two have been known to come into port again with a cargo of rats so large that the seamen were unable to put them down. Others have been taken possession of by the rats and the sailors forced to abandon their vessel at sea. So ravenous and ferocious are the big brown rats that they do not hesitate to attack the sailors when pinched for food. Consequently, while the sailors have rats as company aboard ship, they exercise precaution to limit their numbers. On sailing vessels that are out at sea for a long time there are rat killing days, when all the sailors join forces to destroy the too numerous rodents.

There is a relentless cannibalism practiced among the rats themselves, and this also helps to keep down their numbers. The largest rats do not hesitate to kill and devour the weaker ones. Thus if the English black rat were shipped aboard with the big brown rat, the latter would soon kill the former and set them. Similarly if a dozen brown rats were confined in a cage the stronger would soon devour the weaker and their fight among themselves for supremacy. When drifting about upon the sea on a disabled wreck, the sailors face a danger from the ship rats that grows more menacing as the days go by. If the ship becomes water-logged, the rats are forced to seek safety on the upper decks, and thus cut off from their food in the hold, they watch eagerly the starving sailors. They become bolder and fiercer as the men grow weaker, and one day if relief does not come a fearful tragedy is enacted on the wreck—New York Sun.

Little Pimples Turn to Cancer.

Cancer often results from an impurity in the blood, inherited from generations back. Few people are entirely free from some taint in the blood, and it is impossible to tell when it will break out in the form of dreaded Cancer. What has appeared to be a mere pimple or scroton has developed into the most malignant Cancer.

"I had a severe Cancer which was at first only a few blotches, that I thought would soon pass away. I was treated by several able physicians, but in spite of their efforts the Cancer spread until my condition became alarming. After many months of treatment and growing steadily worse, I decided to try S.S.S. and four months later the little scab dropped off. Ten years have elapsed, and not a sign of the disease has returned."—R. F. WILLIAMS, Guilford, N.H.

It is dangerous to experiment with Cancer. The disease is beyond the skill of physicians. It is the only cure, because it is the only remedy which goes deep enough to reach Cancer.
