THE SPIRIT IS FOR EXPANSION Through all the magnificent reception given Admiral Dewey and the men behind the guns of his warships, in all the speeches, addresses and cheers of the American people, judging from the dis-patches, the tenor and spirit shown is that the American people declare for holding every possession which has come under the American arms, by force or trealy.

It is American and Anglo-Sazon to expand, to broaden out, to acquire, be ft territory, education, religion or commerce.

If it were not for this spirit of expan sion how slow the world would be today, and how would the great reforms have been accomplianed, civilization advanced and christianity carried to the juttermost parts of the earth, if the spirit of Anglo-Saxoniam had not how one crying out and reaching out for new peoples and new lands to subdue, physically, morally and commercially?

In the early days of this great American Republic, this spirit of expansion was arouned, and the great territory within the home bounds was the result. The civil war caused a halt, but when the declaration of war against Spain was heard, there was one people in spirit, united and determined for the success of the arms of the Republic.

The successful conclusion of the war, the new duties involved in its success. has aroused the expansion spirit of the nation, the desire to throw off its lassitude, and to seek to broaden its trade and commerce; and if need be shape any deatiny for good which might threaten evil.

The American Republic is in the world's race for progress and the uplifting of humanity, and no better exhibit that it is in to stay, can be furnished, than in reading the story of Dawey's home coming.
