BUSINESS AND GIVING.

The reply of Andrew Carnegie when asked a question concerning the former business that he made his millions in: "I am out of business; I have reformed."

The question of the reform in the life of Mr. Carnegie seems to be a most thorough one.

From the active and successful money getter, he has become the universal money giver, so that the reform in his life seems to be, ceasing to take from others and giving to all.

But is complete business cessation necessary in the life of any money getter, to thus accomplish the successful merchant's reform?

Or what amount of money must a man accumulate before he shall stop making and turn to giving?

If this solution was left to the average man, there would be few reforms to announce, for the fascination of money getting does not cease - with sufficient unto today and tomorrow, nor will one hundred thousand dollars prove the limit any more than will one or fifty million dollars.

But there can be the business man, millionaire or multi-millionaire, who need not reform by giving up his business, in order to be the good samaritan or the wise philanthropist.

And the ordinary successful and prosperous business man can still continue his active trade, and at the same time be a money giver to the things which demand the support of the philanthropist in order to be kept up.

The reform the world needs is not that the business man must accumulate hundreds of thousands or a million dollars before turning to giving a part of his money to philanthropic objects, but it needs the reform which makes every business man an active money giver to needed charity each day or week during his life, and this without the necessity of giving up his pursuit of trade and dollars.

There is the mean course to pursue between money getting and money giving; between business and philanthropy, and every business man can follow such a course with benefit to himself and the world he lives in.

A Richter Anecdote.

It is not always the great conductor that shines as a composer, though unfortunately he often labors under the delusion that such is the case. On one occasion Hans Richter was present at a concert given by a brother composer at which the latter performed a long and not particularly interesting work of his own.

When the composition came to an end, Richter expressed his criticism in a very few words. "Well," he said, "I, too, had written compositions to make a pile so high—raising his hand three feet from the ground—"but I had buried them?"

Nicely Graded.

It is still a tradition that the people of Manchester, England, should give at Liverpool with the proverb, "A Manchester man, a Liverpool gentleman," but it is said, classification is not so strongly marked in Lancashire as in the old days.

Headache.

The following is quoted from a late work on the diagnosis and treatment of the disease of the eye, by Edward Jackson, A. M., M. D.

"It ought to be universally recognized that eye-strain is the common cause of headache. Aside from headache produced from fever, toxemia and organic disease of the brain and its membranes, eye-strain is almost invariably a factor in the production of headache. The head ache of eye-strain is not of any special character—it may be constant or intermittent, slight or severe, felt only on the use of the eyes, or felt after exertion, exposure to heat or cold, or exhaustion, or it may seem entirely independent of other influences. In the majority of cases eye-strain is not the only factor in the production of headache, but it may be the only factor of practical importance but it alone can be removed, and its removal will give relief. Such headaches are generally felt in the frontal, temporal or occipital regions."

Head the above again, and remember that eye-strain is relieved by glasses properly fitted. We are in every way equipped for scientifically testing the eyes and determining the right glasses. In every case ABSOLUTE SATISFACTION IS GUARANTEED. Prices are as reasonable as good work will justify. J. O. BAXTER, JR.

TAKING BABY'S PICTURE.

Now the up-to-date photographer manages the baby's picture in the days when we were young the photographer by whom a little child was taken for a picture was forced to depend upon the little bird which was supposed to be just on the point of jumping out of his camera.

"Now, Johnny," he would say, "keep your eye right on this little box and watch to see the little bird fly out."

As no bird was ever known to make its nest in a camera little Johnny paid little attention to the photographer's request after the first trial, and consequently the man who made a specialty of "taking babies" had a hard time of it. It was also necessary for the fond parent who did not believe in telling little Johnny "stories" to make an elaborate and usually lame explanation to the darling child, explaining that the picture man had made a mistake in thinking there was a bird inside his box.

Nowadays the photographer man does this sort of thing more wisely. It is still necessary for him to conduct an impromptu vaudeville show in order to keep the infant's attention, but he no longer depends on birds which do not exist.

At the present time the proper expert for the operator to produce a gilt and glass crown which he puts on his own head.

"Now, baby," he says, "you watch and see whether I can keep this crown on my head."

Then he allows the crown to fall off on the floor once or twice, much to the delight of the small child. Then when his subject has been brought to an unconsciously happy frame of mind the photographer replaces the crown on his head and gets ready for action.

"Now, Johnny," he says, "watch just as close as you can and see if your uncle can't keep the crown on this time."

Johnny, fully expecting that the crown will again fall off, opens his eyes and his mouth and gazes full of interest at the glittering bauble. Then the photographer presses the button, and the deed is done; which explains why so many "awfully cute" pictures of small children are now being made.—Chicago Tribune.
