A Great Artist's Method. Mortimer Menpes in his notable wor on Japan tells a story of the great Jap anese artist Klyosai which was relate to him by an English resident of the country: "A friend of his had prepared four magnificent sliding panel ed with the finest silk and had give them to the painter, with the reques that he would execute some of his man terpleces on them for him. For eight or otos vears Kivosat had kept those par els, and they still remained bare, but great masters are always erratic, and the would be purchaser never gave up hope. One day, however, he burst in upon my friend with the terrible intelliee that Kiyosai was dead drunk and had ruined his panels. 'He's smashir away at them on the floor, and he is simply crawling over them,' he said, in a towering rage. My friend agreed to go around with him to Kiyosai's house to try if possible to stop the outrage When they arrived, they found the master in a high state of fever and looking more like a wild animal than a human being, with his tusklike teeth and his poor, pitted face, sweeping and backing about all over the silken pan els. As they entered Klyosai left the room, leaving behind him the panels scattered irregularly over the floor, but each one smothered with work, Look here,' said my friend very generously it was I who introduced Kiyosai to you, and it was I who suggested his painting these doors; therefore it is only fair that I should relieve you of them and find you a new set, which will willingly do.' But the owner of the panels, shrewdly guessing that my friend had not made this magnificent offer without some good reason, chang ed his mind and said that he could or no account receive so costly a gift. He kepis them, and wisely, too, for those panels are now universally consid ered as some of Klyosal's greatest mas

The skin is provided with millions of little pores and glands invisible to the natural eye, yet through these tiny outlets the larger part of the deadly matter that daily collects in the body is carried off. But nature never intended that poisons of an irritating or acid character should be eliminated through the skin, the Liver and Kidneys being their natural poisons are absorbed into the blood and find their way to the surface of the body through the pores and glands of the skin, producing intense itching and burning, inflammation and swelling, and emptions of every conceivable size, shape and character. Skin Diseases differ greatly in their general characteristics and degrees of intensity. Red and angry looking spots break out upon some part of the body with a mass of small outlets, and it is when these important organs fail to perform their functions that these acid

Nothing applied locally to the inflamed surface can bring much relief. The disfiguring eruptions will continue to annoy and pain
