The Coast Line of the Pacific,

The Coast Line of the Pacific, Although the Pacific covers more than half the surface of the globe and has an area estimated roughly at 90, 000,000 aquare miles, yet its coast line, even including that of the Indian beens, is but 47,000 miles, or about 8,000 miles less than that of the Af-iantic. The shores of the Atlantic are very deeply indented by large seas, of which the Baltic and Mediferranean are the most remarkable. Blookless which the Battle and Mediterranen are the most remarkable. Resides these, the greatest interal seas and suits in the Allentic are the guilf of Mexico, Caribbean sea, Hindson bay and the bay of Riessy. If we take from the Pacific the Red sea, Arabias are and bay of Riessi, which are part of the Indian ocean, we leave it with a remarkably straight coast fine, with the exception of a few deep indenta-tions on the coast of Asia. It is owing to a free impenetration of communication between one country and and water and consequent ease of communication between one country and another that the most civilized me-tions of the sorth Aligntic and its interal seas.
