ALLEGED ANTI RAILROAD

FEVER. It hardly needs the statement that every business house, each merchant and citizen, and the public whose interests are based upon development and growth, are sincere friends of railroads.

The recent apparent clash between the government and the railroads, on the proposition of the latter to advance freights has provoked a great amount of comment, by the press and through pamphlets, the railroads being special ly active in this literary movement. Their side of the question possesses merit, as it should, and yet there is much that the railroads do not publish that is the real basis for differences that arise position of railroads towards the public is not that simply of common carrier, hence a public de:nonstration every time passenger or freight rates may be advanced. buys the stock or bonds of the do, O. railroads, and so makes possible the building and extension of all F. It is in the conduct of railroad properties that there are at times protests, and if the true investigation be revealed, the larger percentage of blame will be found on the part of the railroads, for the railroad corporation is not the only corporation that occasionally seriously takes the position that it Price 75c. per bottle. CHAPTER XI. DRAW WITH CHOYNSKI AND WHIP THE

HERE wasn't much time for hunting and fishing on my calendar in 1897. Fighting kept me on the jump. But I did get in a few weeks at home and in the The only time our griends are candid mountains after the Ruhlin fight. Chovnski. San Francisco was stirred up over the match with Chovnski on Nov. 30. Joe was a Frisco boy and had made his start there. He was the first really clever man I ever met in the ring. He was a great man in those days, and I was still practically a beginner and learning slowly. Joe was one of the Fitz has told me that nobody ever hit him such a wallop before, and I can easily believe it. Nobedy ever hit me before or our Frisco fight.

be fighting me, for he weighed only away or block the punches I threw in and was thin as a rail at that I often wonder how men like Fitzsimmons and Choynski can hit so hard.

Joe, like Fitzsimmons, had his strength all where he could use it for punching. He had big shoulders and light legs. He was very fast and could time his punches perfectly.

As soon as the fight began I found out that I was going to be hit. Joe was in and out like a shadow, carefully keeping away from clinches so that couldn't wear him down by using my weight and strength. He held his right back and jabbed with the left until I saw stars. He surely did punch me pretty badly at first.

A few rounds later-I think it was the tenth-Choyuski struck me the hardest blow I ever felt in the ring or out of it. I was walking after him when he suddenly stopped and whipped over a straight punch that eaught me fairly on the mouth. My teeth are very even and grow close together, but ing to do about saving our that was such a terrific blow that it to keep spitting the blood out as I went on fighting, for nothing makes a man so sick as swallowing warm blood.

After this fight I went home to Los Angeles and there was matched against Joe Goddard, the famous flariter cham-

After the clever Chopnaki it was fun to meet a singger. That was just my own game. I went at Goddard as hard as I could sud hadmered him so hedly that in the second round-for the first time in his life—he wanted he quit. He had enough then. He was chieved out for the third round and fought as well as he could. At the end of that round his seconds threw up the spongs. I went to work as usual and did a lot of running and some boxing. I knew that Jackson was a fast and clever big man and that I'd have to use as much speed as possible to offset his skill.

The fight came off in Woodward's pavilion, which divided honors with Mechanics' pavillen in the good old days in San Francisco.

I can remember now just how Jackson looked when he stood up in his corner stripped for the fight. I've seen lot of good men, but I don't think any one of them compared with Jackson. He was as tall as myself, and his shoulders were as wide as a door. His arms were long, and his hands swung nearly to his knees, yet he wasn't at all awkward, like most negroes. His muscles all lay smoothly instead of bunching up anywhere, and he didn't have any fat to spare. I could see at a glance that he had trained hard. He weighed 200 pounds, and the club physicians had pronounced him in perfect

Billy Delaney and Spider Kelly were in my corner. They were the best seconds in the business. They knew enough to keep still when a man was fighting and didn't need advice. Young Mitchell and Patsy Corrigan were behind Jackson.

We started lightly, feinting each othwhen I ripped in a right for the body. Jackson jabbed me on the mouth several times.

By the end of the first round I had learned two things-Jackson's punches weren't as damaging as I had expected, and I could hit him in spite of his cleverness. I've always believed I could beat any man I could hit. The second round I started with a rush.

In the first few seconds I had Jackson on the defensive and taking more since as hard as Joe Choynski did in punishment than he liked. He knew after half a minute that his one chance Choynski was a very light man to lay in mixing it, for he couldn't keep artistic slugging. He ripped some good ones into my body, but it was

"BR'S DONE, JIM," I SAID.

I went atraight at him. He didn't ask for quarter, but put up his hands and tried to jab me away. I pushed in against the jab and punched him in the stomach with my left, bringing the right over to his chin for a quick and mageiful knockout. Jackson fell against the ropes and hung to them to keep from falling. He was practically knocked out, although still on his feet. I had started another left, but pufied
