HOT WEATHER LANGUAGE AND ADVICE.

The authorities state that an expletive is "a word not necessary to the sense, but inserted to fill a va cancy." It is at this season of the year that expletives are most freely used. In every day language an expletive is "a cuss word." Of course there is no explanation that is satisfying why hot weather language, this applies to the male gender, should be so largely expletive. It is so for possibly the same reason that nature carries out the weather in its fullness, by making everything on the high temperature order, so that ninety five degrees being productive of the perspiring man, who finds expression in words to fill up a vacancy but which are not necessary to sense, and it might be added, in no way reduces the temperature.

"While expletives their feeble aid do join,

And ten low words oft creep in one dull

it only goes to show how weak hu man nature becomes when subjected to extreme weather conditions. Equal to, if not quite as degenerating as the hot weather expletive, are the senseless and inane re marks, half questions. No doubt "is it hot enough for you" with the temperature at 100 degrees in the shade was the cause of the to be those who plant it. first hot weather "cuss word," that expletive that could alone fill the vacancy needed in reply to the above street query. Advice as to the regulation of individual habits, in the manner of clothing, and what drinks one shall imbibe. How to avoid flies and mosquitoes. To enjoy night air without catching the malaria. To lay up wood and coal for the cold winter that is to come, these and much other advice not exactly senseless, but certainly as unsuited and as unnecessary as the expletives of the overheated man. But why crowd vacancy in hot weather with expletive or advice? It must surely be cooler, with vacancy unoccu pied.
