A Reckless

By THOMAS R. DEAN

was riding on the Union Pacific railroad, and the train was passing over an elevated portion of the road in the Rocky mountains. The passengers were all looking out through the car windows at the awful heights and depths. Far below my eye caught a macadamized road that did not seem to be much used and was falling out of repair.

"The old stage road," said a gentleman beside me who noticed me looking at it. He was a very old man with hair as white as snow. There was something in the confident, way he spoke of the road, a dreamy, far away look, as he gazed at it himself that arrested my attention.

"How do you know?" I asked.

"Because when I was a very young man," he replied, "I went over it, and an episode that occurred caused me to remember it. That's the Powder Horn bend over there. Pretty soon we'll pass Dead Man's turn.

"The ride I refer to was when the stagecoach was the only method of travel in these parts, and the driver was as important a man then as the captain of an ocean liner is now. Usually the man at the reins was a splendid specimen. He had full control of his horses and always kept his head no matter what imprened. But on this occasion-just about fifty years ago it is now-the person driving us was a different kind of a fellow. I was on top, and several other passengers, east ern tourists who were anxious to see the scenery were outside too. There was one man who didn't seem to be long among the rest of us, but rather to the country. He was a very quiet man, who minded his own business didn't bother the driver with questions about the peaks and the canyons and the cuts around the mountain sides, but sat chewing on a quid of tobacco as though the heights and the depths were nothing compared to it

"We were making one of those turns where the road is cut around a mountain side when, looking down at the wheels on the outside, we all saw that the hind one had gone within a foot of the edge. One of the gentlemen remonstrated with the driver, and it made him very ugly. He said it wasn't customary for passengers to interfere with stage drivers. He knew his business and would listen to 'no sugsections from no man.

"After this, instead of driving carefully when we came to dangerous parts of the road, he would whip up his borses and go round in a hurry. mvery time be did this the rest of us awould hold on to our seats like grim death, expecting to be dashed over the precipies, On one occasion the outside hind wheel did go over, but the driver lasted his horses and pulled it up on the road again.

"There was but one man who didn't seem to be ruffled at this kind of driv speaking of. He sat stiest for ble-seat and 'chawed on.' Some of the passen gers noticing that he appeared to be a man of the west asked him if nothing could be done to induce the driver to mend his ways.

A'Y' needn't do no more skylarkin, the westerner said to the driver, 'ban die them ribbons more keerful.'

"The driver looked around to see who was again interfering, and seeing a quiet looking man flusted angrily and asked him if he was afraid. "'No.' said the other: 'I know what stage drivers can do on the road, but these indies and gents ain't used to it: It skeers 'em.'

"Well, I'm responsible to the line for my drivin and not to you or any one else. I'll handle the team as I please. The westerner made no reply to this, and we, who had gathered a hope that he might put a stop to the reck leasness, felt a disappointment. He didn't seem to be offended or irritated with the driver. He just 'chawed on' and seemed inclined to let the driver do as he fiked. But presently we approached Dead Man's turn, called so from a coach baring gone down over the precipice—there it is across the can you. The driver whipped up his horseand was getting on a big spurt when be feit something cold pressing against the back of his neck. He must have known that it was the mustle of a revolver, for he didn't turn his head to "Slow up." said the westerner, who was holding the pistol.

"The driver slowed up; then at the westerner's further command came to a full stop. "Hitch the reins on to the brake obeyest. Do you see that tree growing over the precipies on this side of the bend? Well, the westerner forced the driver at the point of his revolver to chimb out on to the fathest branch and clung to the branch with the clutch of a cat. At one time I surely though he would go down. I had to look away, and the rest of the party did the

Vulcan Brand Gas Tubing

JULCAN is without a doubt the very best gas tubing on the market to-day. It is made of new high-price material, very flexible. The rubber ends are specially constructed and will not crack.

A Word About Cheap Tubing

ONT use it even though it may cost less. In the end it will cost you more. Cheap tubing is cheap because it is made of cheap stock. It leaks from the very start, perhaps only a little, but enough to annoy you with a smell of leaking gas. The ends split after short use. The tube becomes hard and cracks, then it must be thrown away, necessitating the purchase of another length.
