Meridian.

In which a maiden of unmentionable
age, exults in her freedom, and quotes
the praises of a quondam lover.
Come, Ivan, and list to the secret,
Your 'birdie' would whisper to you,
By a friend breathed ever so softly,
Her mirror so faithful and true,
The story of morning departed,
Fresh girlhood, so fleet and so fair,
Of signals that herald the noontide,
In beauty unclouded and rare.

'Tis noon by the few threads of silver
Inwove with my 'tresses of gold';
By the round and ruddy visage,
Instead of the 'lilies' of old,
But the lips are still 'like the ruby,'
And the eyes 'as the violet of blue,'
And to-day smiles lurk there and ripple
For others, as well as for you.

'Tis noon by the wrinkle that nestles
'Too close to the dimple of youth;
By the lines that meet near the temple,
Incipient crow's feet forsooth!
The 'Touraine's' still 'graceful, but broader'
'As plump as a partridge,' you'd say;
But the step is still 'like the fairy's'
'The voice 'as the linnet's' in May.'

Bring grayness, O Time! or bring fur-
rows,
Take roses and rubies away,
So only the light of years leaves me,
One charm I can boast me to-day;
You called it the crown of my girlhood,
The carnine that mantled my brow
And swore you were 'proud of my blushes'

'Tis crowning maturity now!
How pleasant to sit down and ponder
On gallantries uttered of yore!
To fondle and rhapsodize pictures
Of friends, who are lovers no more!
No husband to count me disloyal,
And brand me a plague of a wife,
Because I am loyal to men 'ries,
Although in the high noon of life.

Adieu to the romance of conquest,
Of coquetry, bellehood, and ball;
And since you have married, to wife-
hood,
The veriest romance of all!
To realms of the blissful Ideal,
And gayly decked Chateau d'Espagne,
For whoever painted such castles
Untenanted by a 'gude man'?

Farewell to the song of the syren,
That lured me with visions of fame;
The iris-hued dreams of ambition;
Of wedding to glory my name,
How like to the dream of Tantalus,
(Don't vote as in days gone before
My figures 'unique' and 'recherche's')
That marvel of mythical lore.

'Tis useless to tell me of shadows
Which lengthen as night draws apace,
That the gathering gloom of the evening
The splendors of day must efface;
Divested of youthful illusions,
Undimmed by the sorrows of age,
A health to the noontide unshadowed,
The brightest of Memory's page!
