A Jaw Dislocated by Yawning.

A lady in the early morning Virginia train going east Saturday met with a peculiar accident, which occurs very seldom. Aroused from her sleep by the arrival of the train at the depot, she yawned, and in so doing the lower jaw slipped from its hinges, and refused to go back in its natural position. Her mouth was very wide open, so much so that she was unable to put her closed hand into it which she did in her embarrassment when the crowd of passengers surrounded her. A physician was sent for, but on his arrival said nothing could be done except that she stopped over here for treatment. This she and her husband and her mother, who accompanied her, declined to do. Meanwhile a large crowd collected in and about the smoking car, for they were journeying second class. A traveling salesman came to the rescue. With that natural knowledge of all affections of the jaw he proceeded to relieve the unfortunate lady from her predicament. He began rubbing her jaws with the knuckles of his hands, warning her, however, that the treatment would be very painful. She withstood it, and in less than a minute the jaw returned to its normal position. The woman and her family were provided with seats in the first-class coach, and after a delay of forty-seven minutes the train carried them toward their home in England, to which they were returning after an unprofitable experience in the Far West. —[Terre Haute Express.]

She Could Not Climb.

Talking across miles of country rather increases the liability to mistakes. At least one cannot know so well who he is talking with.

The other day John F. Wallack, superintendent of the W. U. Telegraph in this district, related a bit of his experience. It occurred during one of the night storms so frequent last summer. The violence of the wind had detached the trunk quadruplex wire, used for New York business, and the testing instrument located the break at the first pole west of Lewisville. Mr. Wallack called up the operator there, and ordered that the break be fixed.

"Can't go out to-night storm is too bad," was the reply.

"Storm or no storm, the thing has to be fixed."

"Well, I've got no ladder."

"Go out and climb the pole." This somewhat testily.

"I can't climb the pole."

"What's the reason you can't?" Manager's temper going fast.

"I'm a woman."

Mr. Wallack had forgotten, in the press of business, that Lewisville had a female operator, but when reminded of it he hired two boys to ascend to it. —Indianapolis News.

Ready Wit.

At the Clark assizes in Ennis, two brothers, named Horrigan, were arrested for setting fire to a police barrack, the property of Darby O'Grady, Esq., and it was stated the barrack had been ignited by means of a jar of pitch, found half consumed near the burned barrack. O'Connell was employed for the defense and by his desire a skilful containing pitch was secretly placed near the witness' chair, and over this O'Connell placed his broad brimmed hat, so as effectually to conceal it. The principal witness for the prosecution swore he discovered the barrack on fire, and knew it was set on fire, by pitch, for he got the smell of it.

"You know the smell of pitch, then?" said O'Connell.

"I do, well," replied the witness.

"You seem a man able to smell pitch anywhere?" said O'Connell.

"Anywhere I find it."

"Even here in this court-house, if it were here."

"No doubt I would."

"And do you swear you don't get the smell of pitch here?" asked O'Connell.

"I do solemnly," replied the witness.

"If it were here I'd smell it." Then O'Connell, taking his hat off the skilful of pitch which was placed beside the witness chair, cried:

"Now you may go down, you perjured rascal! Go down!"

This saved his clients. The jury discredited the witness.
