THE CURE
NEW BERNE, N. C., FEB. 17, 1889.

The Cure of Consumption.
The cure of consumption is not to be sought in drugs. A long and fruitless search has been in progress for hundred of years, and is still going on. It is a disease that can be consumption. There has been a and none ever will be found. Yet hundred of persons have been cured of the disease—not always by physician—often without any aid (hindence) from drugs. The first step in the cure of the disease is the avoidance of the causes. Pure air is an indispensable requisite. Many has been cured in an advanced stage of the disease by passing most of their time outdoors, engaged in some light employment. The consumptive must not allow a fear of the weather to keep him within doors.
He must protect himself from the weather by sufficient clothing, and go out and stay out in all kinds of weather. The diseases is sometimes arrested, and comparative health restored, when nearly one-half of one whole lung has been destroyed.
Numerous cases might be given where recovery took place in more or less advanced stages of the disease. One or two instances must suffice. Dr. James Norcum, of Edgartown, N. C., who had been seriously ill with the disease for a year, was on that account, in February, 1813, discharged from his position as surgeon in the United States regiment. He then commenced the practice of his profession, and continued to attend to the most laborious duties of it at all times of the day and night, in rain, hail, snow, storms, and sunshine, whenever he was called, for eighteen months. Of his condition then he says: "At the end of that time, I had lost my hectic fever, nights sweats, purulent expectoration, and my cough had nearly left me; my chest had recovered its capacity of free and easy expansion, and the ulcers in my lungs were intirely healed." Dr. Norcum lived until 1850, when he was killed by an accident. Dr. Norcum relates the case of a man who, by riding ten miles a day on horseback in 1810, was cured of consumption, and was free from disease twenty years later. "A P.," a lawyer-poet of some renown, a native of New England, was a sixth child. His parents had both died of consumption, and all his brothers and sisters, as they approached the age of twenty-one, paled away and died with the same disease. In his twentieth year he began to grow feeble, and, expecting the same fate as the rest of his family, he went to Arkansas, lived a hunter's life, camped out for weeks and months together, and at the end of twenty years was in perfect health. Outdoor life, in elevated and dry regions, is more beneficial than in damp locations.
In the treatment of consumption, the improvement of the nutrition of the body is very important. One reason why outdoor life proves so beneficial is, that it improves the nutrition as well as purifies the blood. Special attention is often required to insure the digestion and assimilation of fatty elements of food. Cod-liver oil may be of much benefit, being peculiarly well adapted by its composition to digest easily and afford the nutriment most needed in such cases. The general nutrition of the body must receive careful attention. The consumptive, if able to go about, should never give up and confine himself to the house. His only hope is in an outdoor life.—Henry Reynolds, M. D.
