THE JOURNAL.

NEW BERNE, N. C., MAY 3, 1883.

Gustavus and Franklin,
S. Y. Ledger.

Not long since, while the life and character of Dr. Franklin furnished the subject for conversation, the incident of Gustavus of Sweden's repeated invitations to visit the great American Philosopher, and his response thereto, was spoken of; when one of our number remarked that Gustavus was honest at all events.

I did not take exception to the remark at the time, simply because I do not care to dispute under such circumstances. But, truly, I do not think the king was honest—he was not sincere. I will tell the story, and then explain:

While Dr. Franklin was at the French Court, Gustavus III. of Sweden was making a visit to Paris; and mutual friends frequently besought the latter that he would allow them to introduce him to the philosopher; but he declined peremptorily. At length, a French nobleman, who was on terms of intimacy with the Swedish king, asked him why it was that he invariably declined an honor which any crowned head in Europe might be proud to enjoy.

The king replied: "No man can regard Doctor Franklin's scientific accomplishments more profoundly than I do; but the king who affects to like an enthusiast for popular liberty is a hypocrite. As a philosopher, I love and admire Benjamin Franklin; but, as a politician, I hate him; and nothing shall ever induce me to appear on terms of intimacy and personal friendship with a man whom my habits and my position in life oblige me to fear and detest."

Now, there we have Gustavus's declaration of fear and hatred; but was it the influence of the liberty-loving American that he feared? No.
Every word he utters gives proof that it was his own sense of eternal justice—the voice of Liberty within his own bosom—it was his own conscience that held him back from meeting the man with whose principles his inmost soul sympathized, but with which the policy of the king was at variance.

A little girl in a Hartford Sunday school, unused to diplomatic ways, sidled up to her teacher and naively as could be said: "Mother wanted me to find out in a roundabout way whether you are Mrs. or Miss——"
