THE JOURNAL.

NEW BERNE, N. C., JUNE 1, 1883.
Entered as the Post office at New Berne, N. C. as second-class matter.

It is said that Dujuth is now realizing all that Proctor Knott's vivid imagination several years ago prophesied it would be.

Snow fell a foot deep between Lynchburg and Clifton Forge, Virginia, May 23d, 1883. Those fond of chronicling notable occurrences may jot this down in their note books.

The English have placed the bust of the American poet, Longfellow, in Westminster Abbey between the busts of Dryden and Chaucer. They have the American in ancient, but very honorable company.

A PITTSBURGH firm has almost completed a paper steamboat for a Pittsburg company. Its length is twenty feet. It has seating capacity for twenty-five persons and a carrying capacity of three tons. The sheathing is a solid body of paper three-eighths of an inch thick. A bullet from a revolver fired at the sheathing from a distance of only four feet neither penetrated nor abraded it.

MANHATTAN ISLAND, on which the city of New York stands, and Long Island, on which the city of Brooklyn rests, are now united by such mighty cables that the two cities may be hereafter accounted one. The completion of the great bridge was celebrated on the 24th instant with a degree of pomp and parade justified by the occasion. For years to come this bridge will be one of the great attractions of the great metropolis, a marvel of engineering skill of which she has a right to be proud.

ONE of the most noted re-unions of veteran soldiers that has occurred since the cruel war was over was the meeting last week at Niagara Falls, where the Fifth Virginia regiment of Confederates were the guests of the 28th New York regiment. At the battle of Cedar Mountain, the Virginians captured a flag of the New Yorkers in a desperate encounter and last week returned it to the original owners. A one legged Confederate Major handed back the flag to a one armed Union Colonel, with appropriate patriotic and fraternal speeches on the past of give and take. The battle-scarred veterans have seldom fought their battles o'er again under more pleasant circumstances.

A VIRGINIA newspaper editor has been cited to appear before a county court judge to answer for contempt of court. The editor accused the judge of packing a grand jury and is now forced to defend himself, not before a jury, but before the very man he has accused. This matter of constructive contempt is always in danger of becoming a gross injustice. The power of punishing for contempt of court by summary process should be confined to acts and words in the presence of the court on the bench. A judge, who is falsely accused in a newspaper, has the same right of action for libel that all other citizens have and he should have no other recourse. The laws and customs of this country never will harmonize with a practice which makes an aggrieved person judge and jury in his own case.

ENLIGHTLY WEAPONS.

In the summer of 1881, Capt. Jonathan Grey in command of the ship, Levi Lincoln, sailing from Portland, Maine, made a voyage to the Mediterranean and had occasion to spend between three and four weeks in Marseilles.

During the second week of his sojourn in Marseilles our Yankee captain had the misfortune to get into trouble with a French military officer—o (Colonel) Tourzel—well known in the city and in Toulon as a firebrand of the most inflammable and pugnacious description. He had fought many duels, and had killed his man more than once.

As soon as the story of the trouble became known, the friends of Capt. Grey earnestly besought him to take himself out of the way until the thing had blown over. "No," said they, "the colonel will certainly challenge you, and you cannot show yourself in the city after you have refused to fight him."

"But," said Grey, "I haven't refused. He hasn't asked me." "Ah! but he will, and of course you wouldn't think of offering your life to a man to whom the sword and pistol are the every day playthings of a lifetime."

But the Yankee skipper only shook his head, and promised that he would take good care of Number One.

Within half an hour after the friends had left, a friend of the colonel's came with a challenge, couched in formal terms. The messenger was a captain of hussars, as polite as could be.

"You, Monsieur, will have the choice of weapons. It will make no difference with the colonel—swords or pistols—ten spaces or twenty."

Capt. Grey bowed and informed the hussar that he would send a formal reply by a friend as soon as he had selected one.

"Of course," said the Frenchman who chanced to speak English, "you will allow us to select the locale, as we are acquainted with the environs. We know one beautiful place, just beyond the northern gate, we have passed."

All right. They were welcome to select the place. "Only," suggested Grey, "I shall want plenty room."

"Ah! Good! Very good!" And the hussar went away laughing at what he thought an excellent joke. Capt. Grey dressed himself in his best. He had a bit of gold lace which he put on upon an occasion, and he put it on now. He dressed himself and then went and found a brother skipper of Yankee birth, to whom he made known his need.

"But, cried Capt. Ben, Blazo,—the New York shipmaster,—you don't mean that you are going to fight that man! Why—the very thought is suicidal!"

"Just you hold on a bit, if you please. Suppose I should select harpoons as the weapons?" "Why, they would reject them at once, and would be borne out in the refusal. That won't do, Grey."

"I heard once of a Yankee whiteman who offered to fight a duel in that fashion; and he carried the day. But he went on to the ground with the harpoons before the weapons had been named. I flatter myself that I can handle a harpoon with any man that ever sailed out of a Yankee port."

"I know you can, Jack, but that won't do here. But if you could ring in the harpoon, you'd have him foul!" "Well, Ben, I want you to come with me. I've got an idea."

seconds and the surgeon of his regiment, was on the ground. And there were others in the background. The thing had become noise abroad—at least, among the immediate associates of the parties concerned; and not only were there a dozen or more of French officers and civilians but as many more suffering gentlemen, sailing under the stars and stripes, who had come out from their vessels, then lying within the Mole.

And pretty soon a coach appeared, from which stepped Captain Jonathan Grey and his two seconds, and the attache of the museum came forth with the weapons in his arms.

"But—what were they? 'Harpoons!' cried a New Bedford skipper, who had pressed forward. But he saw his mistake as soon as he had got near enough to gain a clear view. No, they were not harpoons. But what were they! Ah, hark! Capt. Grey now stepped forth to speak for himself.

"Gentleman," he said, "I have been challenged to fight a duel. I never deserted my colors, yet, and shall not do it here in Marseilles; but I propose to fight with a weapon that I know how to use. And surely, you, if you be true Frenchmen, cannot object to the lance—the weapon of your best and bravest! And, my friends, I can tell you further: One of these lances has been wielded, in knightly combat, by a French king, Aye—this, which I here hold"—taking one of them from the keeper—"was borne by Henry the Fourth in a gallant tourney in this very place! Therefore you cannot object to my choice of weapons! And now, I am ready. You, colonel, may, if you like, take the lance of Henry the Fourth."

"Grand Dieu!" gasped the colonel, utterly astounded. "This is one Yankee trick!"

But the Americans, and half a dozen English naval officers who had come out, all joined in asserting that the lance was a knightly weapon; and, ergo, the weapon of a gentleman. The noblest men, the bravest soldiers, had been proud to be permitted to wield it.

Capt. Grey threw off his coat and grasped a lance. The stout ash shaft was full ten feet long, and the steel head, or blade, which the keeper had carefully brightened, gave proof of its temper in its color. This head, of finest steel, was about twelve inches in length, two or three inches wide in its broadest part point as sharp as the point of a sword.

While the colonel, in a terrible state of unrest, was conversing with his two seconds, Capt. Grey, who appeared to overflow with vitality, having given the lance a few twists about his head, brought it to a point, took deliberate aim at an oak tree that stood twenty feet away, and let it fly. He threw with such force and such precision that the steel head struck the tree in the centre, skining it to a depth that held it steadily in position; as though it had been an arrow shot from a strong bow.

"Ten thousand thunders! I shall not do it!" gasped the colonel. "It is an anachronism! I am not obliged!"

And nothing would turn him from his purpose. He heaped all manner of abuse upon the trick, and upon its perpetrator, evidently hoping he could goad the Yankee into giving him the challenge. He certainly tried to do that thing; but his rage only made the Yankees laugh more and more heartily; and, at length, in despair, he turned and left the ground, hurling back, as he went, the terribly cutting remark that he would not associate himself with "miserable tricksters!"

But even that failed of its intent. Instead of being angry, the Americans only laughed the louder; the English joined because they could not help it. And, as soon as the colonel and his immediate friends had gone, those of the Frenchmen who remained on the ground made it known that their sympathies were entirely with the Yankee captain. Not only did they enjoy the fun of the huge joke, but they were rejoiced to see the quarrelsome, dual fighting colonel for once in his life completely beaten.

Col. Tourzel returned to town and remained there just four-and-twenty hours. The morning of the following day saw him in the saddle, headed for Toulon. It had become too hot for him in Marseilles.

And Captain Jonathan Grey was a hero. The story flew. It was one of the best things ever known. There had been a fear in the mind of the attache of the museum that the Directors might possibly find fault with him for letting the lances—especially the historic lance of Henry IV.—go out from the building; but, on the contrary, they had reason to be thankful, for never before had there been such a rush to the museum. For several weeks there came hundreds every day, anxious to see the knightly weapons of the Yankee captain's duel.

A citizen of New Hampshire undertook to introduce his townsmen Mr. Green, attorney-at-law. "Gentlemen," said he, "this is Mr. Turney, green at law."
