Dead, But Not Sensible of It.

We have often beard the story of the Irishman's reply to his wife when she reproved him for not killing the turtle, though Pat had taken the creature's head off. That reply is now applicable to the butterfly as has been proven in this city within the last few days. A gentleman tells us that his little daughter had obtained some grasses for the purpose of placing on the mantlepiece, and wished to ornament it with butterflies. She obtained quite a number of these and not wishing to torture them to death by fastening them in the grass, had their heads clipped off and dropped them into a box to die. Forty-eight hours afterwards the little girl reported to her father that her butterflies were still alive. The father being a little incredulous about the matter went and examined for himself and sure enough found them crawling about. "They were dead but not sensible of it."

It will do no harm to have a large crowd visit our city occasionally; on occasions like this visitors will be sure to leave more money than they carry away. We hope the committee will take some defion a trip occasionally and is back before nite action to-day, and we further sugwe find out he is even gone.
