RUTH'S VISIT.

Ruth Irving sat despondent and alone in her pretty sitting room, her head rested on her hand, and her heart was heavy in her bosom. The every day routine of life oppressed her. The everlasting sweeping, dusting, baking; so many pies, so many cakes and puddings to be manufactured and consumed daily, really distressed her. Was it right she wondered to bestow so much thought and care upon the body which could be nourished with so much less trouble and expense. She was tired, desperately tired of it all. She almost thought a real grievance would be easier to bear, there she could have looked for sympathy, and had the relief of real tears. Now if she ventured to hint her feeling, people promptly replied:

"You ought to be thankful you have something to cook," and it was true, she ought, and so she was, and yet Ruth did not realize that it was not the multitude of confections, nor the everyday routine that warped her soul.

Rousing herself from her reverie as the clock struck, she assumed her outdoor attire preparatory to paying a visit which duty and friendship required of her, but from which she selfishly shrank, because she could not bear to encounter a scene of suffering.

Mary Marlow was called upon to part with the neat little home upon which she had fixed her hope and affection. For years she had toiled beyond her strength in the hope of being able to retain this cherished spot. At this home her children had been born, and from its shelter one had been buried; here she had received her friends, and every nook and cranny was fraught with some pleasant recollection. Her hands had planted the roses and verbenas which brightened the grass plot, and trained the honey suckle and wisteria that adorned the lattice. But the combined efforts of herself and husband had been in vain, losses, and sickness had prevented them from meeting just demands and now they were obliged to part with this house and shift for themselves as best they could.

Ruth paused on the doorstep, felt in her pocket for her clean handkerchief and mentally rehearsed the condoling sentences she had deemed suitable to the sad occasion.

The composed and cheerful woman who answered her ring astonished her not a little but she made no audible comment and following her friend's cue saluted her as if nothing had happened.

A little half-finished dress lying across a chair attracted her attention when she first entered the room and she was glad to seize on an indifferent topic of conversation.

"Who is that for? you have no child of that age."

"O that is for little May Grant, her mother you know is old, and has very poor eyesight, and I am trying to get May ready to attend Sunday school, she is so disappointed when our girls go, and she is obliged to remain at home, that I thought I would try to finish her dress before next Sunday, but really I am so busy I am afraid I cannot accomplish it."

There was a choking sensation in Ruth's throat as she said, "Where are you going to move?"

The brave voice did falter a little as Mary answered, "We have no place in view, as yet."

But, understanding that owners did not care either to sell or rent to the bankrupt man, did not think her friend frivolous when she returned to the subject of little trills and flounces and cheap lace edgings. When she returned home an hour later she carried in her hand a parcel which contained a little sacque which she had volunteered to make in order to assist her friend in her charitable work, and she carried beside an idea which was destined to bear good fruit.

Happy under the circumstances Mary could scarcely be, yet it was not her forehead that was wrinkled with discontent.

Ruth sat down to the sewing machine and working with a will upon the little garment reviewed rapidly in her own mind the contents of various boxes and bundles stowed away in her house. A frill from here, a little feather from there, and a handkerchief from another were added to complete little May's outfit, and in doing even this small service for another Ruth felt her soul relieved from part of its wonted oppressions. She did not soon forget Mary's example. She had gone prepared to endure the sight of tears and lamentations, but the kindness of the heart which even in its own wretchedness had thought for the comfort and good of others, surprised and reproved her, and much cogitation on this subject, and many new plans and resolutions drove away her morbid feelings, and kept her from dwelling on the monotony of much cooking, and beneath the accustomed hands the next batch of pies and cakes almost made themselves.

Advice to Brides.
Love is blind, but love is not deaf. So don't snore.

Do not be in a hurry to buy all the new fabrics you see. A richly dressed woman runs the risk of being mistaken for a servant girl.

Do not threaten to go home to your mother oftener than five times a week. As you don't go he may eventually begin to doubt your sincerity.

Do not get angry when your husband first asks you to darn his stockings. Smile sweetly and suggest that it would be cheaper to buy new ones.

Have a house with a furnace in and keep both it and the range going over night. That will improve your chances for happiness 600 per cent.

Your husband's wardrobe will frequently require repairs in the way of buttons. Always leave the needle, thread and button bag where he can get them.

If your husband complains that you cannot cook as his mother does, comfort him with the reflection that you probably will by the time you are as old as she is.

Many women make a practice of protesting against the word "obey" in the marriage service after the marriage has taken place. This is a mistake. Do not protest against it. Quietly ignore it.

If you told him you loved the odor of tobacco while he was courting you, do not begin to speak of smoking as "a horrid, disgusting, beastly habit" right after you are married. Wait at least a week.

If you need a pair of new shoes say nothing about them, but get the money for something else, and then while he is away slip out and select the shoes yourself. Even a pair of seven look small to a man so long as he does not know the number.

If you have a pet dog always keep him around, and then when your husband relaxes his attentions fly to the dog for comfort, hugging and kissing him right before your husband. If he gets mad and kicks the dog, it will be a sure sign that he still loves you.

Remember that getting married is no reason why you should shut yourself up in the house. Accept all invitations just the same as before and have a good time. When he comes home and finds both you and the fire out, he will realize how cheerless life would be without you.

In the course of a month your husband will probably ask why you never go near the piano any more. All men do. An effective reply is to hunt up an old book of exercises and practice three hours every evening for a week while he is at home. He will attend to his own affairs after that.
