THE LATEST NEWS.

The Cyclone. News and Observer.

WADESBORO, Feb. 21, 1884. Every few hours brings more news of the destruction of property and loss of life by the storm. The cyclone either divided before it reached the North Carolina line, or we had two traveling in almost parallel lines. One passed through Darlington, S. C., and crossed Pee Dee river, in the lower part of this Of SPRING SAMPLES county, and then went on to Rockingham, where it did great damage. A private letter from there says fifty persons were killed and wounded in Richmond county. The other cyclone passed west of this place, crossing the Carolina Central road about half a mile east of Polkton, and crossed the river up near the Montgomery line. This one passed right through the county and destroyed every living thing in its path. So far I have heard positively of the death of only six persons in Anson.

DEATH AND DEVASTATION IN RICHMOND. The Rockingham Rocket says the storm began about 9 o'clock and lasted about two hours, and during that brief space about forty houses were leveled with the ground and some 20 souls hurried to eternity. A small village of colored people, of about 20 houses, was destroyed, and 10 persons killed outright and several wounded.

The track of the cyclone was about 150 or 200 yards wide, and went in a northeasterly direction. The most graphic description that can be given you will give you but a faint idea of the devastation this severe storm has left in its hurried passage.

A meeting has been held in Raleigh for the relief of the cyclone sufferers. One hundred and sixty-six dollars were raised at the meeting.

Reports from the flooded districts on the Ohio river are to the effect that the river is falling and the supplies of food received are abundant.
