THE TICKET.

In the selection of the ticket at Chicago, the Republicans have departed from the course that was blocked out for them in the public mind outside of the strict political circles.

Public sentiment has for the last few years leaned so strongly towards a reconciliation of feeling between the sections, and the demonstrations at the North on various occasions so clearly illustrated the fact that the masses there, as here, were tired of the strife and bitterness which has existed so long between them and us, and were disposed to fraternize in a real and lasting union of sentiment, that every one was prepared to see some man of the mildest type of Republicans receive the nomination.

This is not the case, however, for Mr. BLAINE has long been known as the adroit flauter of the "bloody shirt," and entertains a seemingly cordial hatred of Southern people, Southern sentiment and habits. He regards the great North as the American Government, quite able to take care of itself independent of our aid or comfort, further than an obedience to the laws and a reasonably liberal contribution to the revenues of the treasury.

He has no faith in Southern Democracy, and but little in Southern Republicanism. His position before the National Committee four years ago clearly illustrates that fact and it is fair to suppose, foreshadows his plan of the coming campaign. "Send no money down South" was his advice then and will be again. Send it into doubtful States at the North and West, be sure to hold such States as we count secure and let the South go to the d— Democrats.

Whether Mr. BLAINE was selected on that ground, or whether as the result of a strong feeling of sympathy for him in the loss of the nominations at two previous conventions, and his late down and out episode in his diplomatic position in which he thought to win immortal laurels, we are in doubt, but as we prefer to think it the latter, we incline to that view of the subject.

Mr. BLAINE is a fine representative of the truest type of the American citizen. Starting from an humble walk in life, he has fought his way step by step to the exalted position he now occupies. Endowed with a clear comprehensive intellect, indomitable energy and vim, possessing a large amount of what politicians call personal magnetism, and social manners of the most popular character, it need not be thought that he will fail to command the support of his party at the North, nor need it be even dreamed that he can do more, for it will be late in the afternoon when any Democrat votes for him.

The nomination of Mr. BLAINE now furnishes the Democratic party another reason to nominate Mr. TILDEN, because it is well understood that his financial ability claims great respect from the capitalist of the North, and we think it quite evident that Mr. EDMUNDS and ARTHUR were the recipients of the support of that important element of the party at the late convention.

The nomination of Gen. LOGAN, we deem of no special significance further than to conciliate the few adherents that followed his fortunes in the hopeless search for the nomination for the Presidency, by giving them the second place on the ticket and the contingents attached thereto. He neither adds strength to the ticket nor contributes a mite to its weakness.

It is the Republican ticket, and Democrats must remember that they have to beat it or it will beat them.

What Makes a Gentleman.

Willie Lee is a boy who knows how to behave himself. He has understood, ever since he has been able to understand anything, the difference between politeness and rudeness; and, what is more, he can, when he chooses, act in every respect like a gentleman. Consequently it is not strange that when Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Smith, or any other of Mrs. Lee's acquaintances "drop in," to make an afternoon call, and happen to find Willie in the parlor they usually form a very good opinion of his manners, and frequently go away, saying, "What a polite boy Willie is! Why, he is a perfect little gentleman!"

But could these same persons observe Willie's behavior at some time when no company is present, probably their remarks would be of a different character.

"Hurrah!" exclaimed Willie, one day, not very long ago, "father's going to take me out sleigh riding!" So saying, he rushed into the sitting-room, and began to inquire loudly for his cap and overcoat, and at the same time making sundry evolutions around the room, and managing to upset during the operation two or three chairs, beside his sister's work basket.

"Gently, Willie, said his mother. "There! you have waked the baby already."

"I can't help it," rejoined Willie, very indifferently; as though he did not care at all whether he could help it or not.

Indeed, he showed very plainly that he was far from being sorry for the mischief he had done, for the general bustle which he had contrived to create was not only continued, but increased.

"Willie, do be careful!" "Willie, you must not be so rude!" "Willie, please be quiet!" were the exclamations that came from all parts of the room. One would have thought that Willie would have been tired of hearing his name repeated so often. Perhaps he was; for it was not long before he ran out into the hall, calling at the top of his voice: "Sarah! come here quick! I want my coat!"

"Well, if you expect me to get it for you, you can just ask more politely, so you can," was the rejoinder that came from the foot of the stairs.

It would be hardly safe to repeat the answer which followed—some little boy might be foolish enough to imitate it—but it was so poorly calculated to restore Sarah's good humor, that Willie was left to find his coat the best way he could alone.

He had just discovered it lying under a sofa, with his cap in one of the pockets, (he had thrown it there upon his return from school, when the sound of the sleigh-bells was heard approaching the door.

"Oh dear!" he exclaimed, "there comes father, and I'm not ready. Mother help me put this on, wont you?"

"Mother" lent her assistance, and the slamming of doors, which followed, proved that it was Willie and no one else who was leaving the house. Mrs. Lee uttered a sigh of relief, and sat down; Grandpa Harris resumed his spectacles and his reading, and all was quiet for two hours. At the end of that time Willie returned and with him, which was not so welcome, the noise.

"Willie," said his grandfather, after supper, when he and the little boy had been left alone together, "you have not been a very good soldier to-day. You have been wounding a number of your friends without cause."

"How is that, sir?" asked Willie, (he never spoke disrespectfully to the grandfather.)

"Don't you remember my saying the other day, that all who live in the world are soldiers, fighting together in the battle of life? Every family is a company in the great army. Now what would you think of a soldier in camp who should suddenly rise, without any reason for so doing, and begin to attack the members of his own company; drawing his sword over one, sticking his bayonet into another, and firing at a third? You would say that the man was beside himself. Yet this is exactly what you have been doing all day. Why, just think how many persons' feelings you have injured only this afternoon. First, you displeased your mother when you awoke the baby so rudely; then you hindered your sister with her work, and stopped your grandfather's reading; after that you offended Sarah by speaking to her so unkindly; and at the tea-table you made your little sister very uncomfortable by laughing at a slight mistake she made. Ah! my boy, if you mean to be a gentleman when you grow up, you must begin by being gentle now. I remember, when I was a boy"—Willie's eyes brightened—"there were two boys attending the same school that I did, who were unlike in every respect. One of them was from the country—a farmer's son. His clothes were of plain homespun; his boots coarse and heavy, and his short, bushy hair always stood out straight from his head. He knew nothing about the customs of what is termed polite society; yet if the most important thing in the character of a gentleman is, as I lately read, 'a respect for the feeling of others,' he was truly a gentleman. He never lost an opportunity of doing any one a kindness, and he was careful not to displeasure even the smallest child in school. Of course, Mike, as we called him, was a great favorite and had plenty of friends. The other boy, Alfred, had been brought up among the refinements of city life. He knew how to bow politely, and to dance gracefully, and to speak pleasant smooth sounding words. His clothing was always in the newest style, and his toilet made with the greatest care. Those who had seen him only a few times thought him a model of politeness. Yet a more selfish, disobliging boy it would be hard to find. He cared nothing for the wishes of others so long as he could please himself, and did whatever his fancy led him to do, even though it were at the expense of offending those whom he called his friends. I learned from observing those two boys that true politeness consists not in outward manners, but in real kindness of heart—in the desire and effort to make others happy. Willie, my boy, you must be more gentle."

Willie promised to try. It is to be hoped he will succeed. "The fruit of the Spirit is gentleness."

Not long ago a Boston alderman was invited to dinner. He said: "There wasn't nothing on the table when I got there but some forks and spoons and bricky-brac. Presently they brought in some soup. I didn't see nothin' else, so I thought I'd eat all the soup I could, though soup is mighty poor dinner to invite a feller to. So I was helped four times; and then come one of the finest dinners I ever see, and there I sot," groaned he, "chock full of soup!"

Durham is historic. It was neutral ground while the armistice was pending between Sherman and Johnson. Soldiers of both armies filled their pouches with the tobacco stored there, and, after the surrender, marched homeward. Soon orders came from the East, West, North and South, for "more of that elegant tobacco." Then ten men ran an unknown factory. New it employs 800 men, uses the pink and pick of the Golden Belt, and the Durham Bull is the trade-mark of the best tobacco in the world. Blackwell's Durham Long Cut is Durham in its daintiest and handiest form.

Often Before the Meridian of Life is reached, the teeth decay. In nine cases out of ten they become carious through neglect. The timely use of Soudont arrests the destructive effects of impurities which have been allowed to accumulate upon the teeth. Children's teeth polished and invigorated by this salutary botanic preservative, will remain sound and white until a ripe old age, and failing teeth are rescued by it from increasing dilapidation.

When you come to think of it, it is not odd that literary people prefer a pipe to a cigar. It is harder to smoke when they are writing, and ever so much cleaner. And then it gives them the true essence and flavor of the tobacco, the conscious praise and the habitual smoker demands. The very choicest tobacco grown on this Belt is bought by Blackwell's Durham Tobacco Co., and appears in their celebrated Bull Durham Smoking Tobacco. It is known the world over. Get the genuine, with Bull trade-mark, then you will be sure of having absolutely pure tobacco.
