THE JOURNAL.

TEW BEENE, N. C., AUG. 26, 1889

Prof. Langley, in one of his interesting and valuable series of papers on "The New Astronomy," in the Contury Magazine, relates an anecdote of the great Florentine astronomer Galileo, which, we presume, will be new to many of our readers.

When Galileo first turned his glass on Saturn, he saw, as he thought, that it consisted of three spheres close together, the middle one being the largest. He was not quite sure of the fact, and was in a dilemma between his desire to wait longer for further observation, and his fear that some other observer might announce the discovery If he

-te announce it so as to secure the priority, and yet not announce it till he was ready-might seem to present as great a difficulty as the discovery itself; but Galileo solved this, as we may remember, by writing it in the sentence, "Altissimum planetam tergeminum observavi" (1 have observed the highest planet to be triple), and then throwing it (in the printers' phrase) "into pi," or jumbling the letters which made the sentence into the monstrous word: SMAJSMRMJLMEMOFTALEVNJPVN-

Referring in the same article to he great equatorial telescope at Washington, Prof. Langley says: 'Galileo's original lens was a single piece of glass, rather smaller than that of our common spectacles; but the lens here is composed of two pieces, each twenty-six inches in tiameter, and cellects as much light as a human eye would do if over two feet across,

But this is useless if the lens is not shaped with such precision as to send every ray to its proper place at the eye-piece, nearly thirty-five foot away, and, in fact, the shape given to its surface by the skillful hands of the Messrs. Clark, who made it, is so exquisitely exact that all the light of a star gathered by this great surface is packed at the distant focus into a circle very much smaller than that made by the dot on this i,—a thing we might call incredible were it not certain. It is with instruments of such accuracy that astronomy now works."
