Follies of Bress. The people who long for a sensible style of dress may justly complain that the fashions of the present day do not satisfy their ideals.

They may, however, cultivate a reasonable amount of gratitude for the blessings they really enjoy in that direction, by casting a back.

Says Mary Frampton, whose journal furnishes one of the mirrors by which we may study by gone manners and customs: In 1870, everybody wore powder and pomatum, and a large triangu-lar thing called a cushion, to which the hair was frizzed up, with three or four enormous curls on each

The higher the pyramid of hair. ganze and feathers was carried, the more fashionable it was thought to be, and such was the labor employed in rearing the fabric, that nightcaps were made in proportion to it, and covered over the hair, immense black pins, powder, pomatum and all, ready for the next day. Twenty four pins was by no means an unusual number to wear to bed.

The perfection of figure, according to the fashion of the time, lay in the smallness of the circumference into which one's unfortunate waist could be compressed, and many a poor girl hurt her health very materially by trying to rival the reigning beauty of that day, the Dutchess of Rutland, who was said to sqeeze her waist to the size of an orange and a half.

In 1791, says the same writer, all the gentlemen wore queues, or tails, of considerable length and thickness near the head dwindling by degrees towards the extremity, the whole well-plastered and powdered; they wore, also, great curls, frizzed, powdered, and pomatumed, at the ears.

Ladies wore their hair flowing down their backs, and high in front with much pomatum and powder put on with different kinds of puffs This powder was applied at a distance, that every hair might be frosted with it. One pound and sometimes two of powder were often put into the hair, or wasted in the room, in one dressing.
