NEW BERNE, N. C., APRIL 1, 1886. Entered at the Post Office at New Berne, N. C., as second-class matter.

THE DAILY JOURNAL.

Today four years ago the first No. of the Daily Journal made its appearance. Since that time it has regularly appeared except on such legal holidays as we thought proper to give our employees, never missing an issue on account of accident or lack of material.

The primary object of the publication of the JOURNAL is to obtain a livelihood for its publishers, and in return for the patronage given it the publishers endeavor to give a paper worthy of patronage; they aim to give the news, and advance the material interest of the city in which it is published and the country in which it circulates.

We enter upon our fifth year much encouraged by past patronage and hopeful of making material improvements in the near future. We sincerely thank our patrons, one and all, for the support they have given us in the past, and can only promise that in the future we will use every effort to give them a paper worthy in every respect of their continued patronage.

HAIR-SPLITTING DECISIONS.

It will perhaps be considered unbecoming and out of place for a small, local newspaper to criticize decisions of our Supreme Court, especially so when the editor of such paper is not a lawyer and not versed in the rules which govern in courts. But it does really seem that when the court grants a man who has been convicted of a crime a new trial upon the ground that one of the grand jurors who found the bill of indictment had not paid his taxes, the thing is being reduced to a fine point.

It is very difficult for ordinary mortals to understand the quirks of law, or the mental processes of courts of justice. Nearly all people know right from wrong and sense from nonsense till the one or the other of these becomes a subject of judicial action; then the mists and fog of law, rules of procedure and technicalities, if supported by money or social influence, are sufficient to mislead even those who profess a full knowledge of the complicated code.

"No, Ethel; when you hear of a young girl having made a good match, it doesn't signify that she has got something that will get up every morning and light the fire."

THE TWO LOST FLAGS.

Of the 27th Massachusetts and of the 27th North Carolina. (From the Republican.)

The annals of war for the Union will never be complete till long after the last soldier on either side has gone to his final reward. Each changing season unrolls a new and romantic chapter pertaining to the great conflict.

On the 18th of October, 1861, while the regiment were encamped on the Wilburham road in this city, a mile east of the armory, they were presented with a stand of state and United States colors by Maj. Andrews, assistant commissary-general of Massachusetts, and this was what he said: "Though they be stained with human gore, riddled by weapons of destruction, hurled by an infuriated foe, or faded by the lapse of time, bring them back unblemished—bring them back a crown of glory for your brow."

In the spring of 1863, after the battles of Roanoke Island and New Berne, Gen. Burnside issued orders that all the regiments of his command should place those names on their banners. The 27th men were the heroes of the hour here at home, and the women of Springfield seized the opportunity of sending them a new flag by Col. Lyman and Lieut. Traflet, who were returning to North Carolina after a brief furlough.

It was a flag of blue, bearing the Massachusetts coat of arms on a silken fabric, and cost $100. It has always been called, to this day, "the ladies' flag." It was presented to the regiment, then in camp near New Berne, June 2, by Chaplain Woodworth in "an eloquent and vigorous address."

Maj. Andrews spoke as a prophet. May 16, 1863, the regiment and the rest of the Star brigade were posted on the extreme right of the Union line, at the base of Drury's Bluff, a dense fog enveloping the field. It was the most important position of the Federal line, but the brigade was unsupported and the regiment was outflanked in the fog, after repelling several assaults in front, 249 being taken prisoners.

When the rebels swarmed around the flags Color Bearer Gage of Mouson began to tear the ladies' flag from the standard, intending to hide it in his bosom, but a rebel officer placed a pistol at his head with the threat, "Tear another thread and I'll blow your brains out," so that Gage had to put the banner on the ground. The flags and men were taken to Richmond that morning, and in the afternoon as the men looked out of the Libby prison windows they saw their banners borne through the streets by the enemy in triumphal procession.

There was another 27th regiment in the battle of New Berne, commanded by Maj. Gilmer; its casualties were 4 killed, 8 wounded and 42 missing, while our regiment had 7 killed and 78 wounded. Co. A of the 27th North Carolina, the Goldsboro Rifles, had their "ladies' flag." It was of the ordinary Confederate pattern, or heavy silk, and the letters which showed that it had been presented to the Goldsboro Rifles by the Wayne County Female Seminary, and that the motto of the company should be "Victory or Death," were elaborately worked.

When the battle opened the orderly sergeant begged Maj. Gilmer to permit him to carry it, but the request was refused, as the orders did not allow company flags on the field. So it was left behind in the camp, which during the day fell into the hands of our 27th. A few days later Col. Lee brought the flag to Springfield, it was turned over to the soldiers' union, and in time became one of the fixtures of Grand Army hall, lost as effectually to Goldsboro as was our ladies' flag in the streets of Richmond.

And yet the latter has for five years adorned the stairway of the city library, and the former was borne back to the thriving North Carolina town last night, with martial music, oratory and feasting just as we received our banners on Washington's birthday, 1881. The northern standard was discovered in a government museum at Washington by a soldier of the legion that loved it, and the southern ensign was brought to light by means of a letter written at a venture last summer by a Springfield Grand Army man to "the captain of the Goldsboro Rifles." The survivors of our standards "faded by the lapse of time," but also "unblemished and a crown of glory." And now they have sent to the North Carolina company, along with the flag they brought away, a new silken star spangled banner, as a pledge that a common devotion to the flag of the fathers is one of the richest fruits of the late unpleasantness.

Early Rising a Humbug.

Dyspepsia has one virtue, it will get out, bag and baggage, if given a fair chance. It can only be kept as a companion by being fed and nourished according to its own peculiar tastes.

Of all the humbugs ever gotten up for the cure of dyspepsia, early morning walks are perhaps the greatest. A long walk on an empty stomach will exhaust a well man. How much more will it exhaust and tire one already suffering from lack of vital energy! It will do very well for those with a tendency to overeatness or with too much vital energy. The dyspeptic is the better for sleep and rest.

The old doctrine that the early morning air is purer and healthier than that of midday has been exploded. The foul damps that rise from the earth after the vitalizing and purifying rays of the sun have been withdrawn are still aloft. The air may feel much cooler, and to one with plenty of good blood it is most agreeable, because it robs his system of the surplus heat which induces the languor he experiences when he first gets out of bed.

The thin-blooded individual will suffer chills, while his fat friend will be experiencing a glow. One is braced up, the other shaken up. There is the difference. It is a question of blood, not of nerve or disposition. The fat man is not jolly because he is fat, nor is the jolly man fat because he is jolly. They are fat and jolly because their digestion is good.

The first thing a dyspeptic must do in order to get well is to give his brain a rest. Let him cultivate a habit of resting quietly one hour after eating a breakfast of boiled steak, toast and clear coffee; sleeping one hour or more, after a dinner of roast beef, fish or fowl, toast and coffee, or milk; an hour's rest after a supper of steak, game or fish, toast and coffee or tea, plain.

There has been a good deal of fad poking at the hot water cure for dyspepsia, yet the fact remains that no better tonic and regulator for the stomach is known to the medical profession than that same goblet of hot water—as hot as can be borne sipped slowly a half hour before each meal.

Real, plain food, plenty of sleep and freedom from care will knock the toughest case of dyspepsia silly that can be found in the State. Pills and powders are no good for steady use. Occasionally they may be needed, but not often.

Alcoholic and fermented drinks are bad medicines for dyspepsia. Slops are not good for dyspepsia, neither is too much cracked wheat, oatmeal or corn starch. These should be touched sparingly. Milk is excellent when it agrees with one. Coffee with milk or cream in it will ruff up bitter, but with only a little sugar will aid digestion. The same with tea where it is not too much of a stimulant.

A CARD.

To all who are suffering from the errors and indiscretions of youth, nervous weakness, early decay, loss of manhood, etc., I will send a recipe that will cure you. FREE OF CHARGE. This great relief was discovered by a missionary in South America. Send a self-addressed envelope to the Rev. Joseph T. ISMAEL, Station D, New York City. n17 daw
