Again every body was convulsed with shricks of laughter, which was kept up at intervals till nearly daylight. The writer "climbed up in the loft" (the upper berth of the sleeper) and listened to the concert below—a chorus of snores, some treble, some bass, some alto—till about 5 o'clock, where he descended from his lofty porch to the rest of the sleeper. 5 o'clock, when he descended from his lofty porch to the rear of the sleeper, where he was soon joined by several of the ladies; all on the look out for fine views of the mountains; nor were we disappointed.

Many of the ladies rode mules, all the way, and they rode remarkably well too, over those rough and rugged roads. Passing through Lakey's Gap, we soon found the level of Broad river, along whose wild and romantic banks we traveled for miles. Nowhere on the way was the seenery mountainous at one bend of the river, we would meet a-bold cliff, seeming to dispute our pas-sage; again we would wind slowly around the top of a high bluff with the river thundering at its base, while opposite us, leading up still higher into the 'eternal hills' were wild gorges, clothed with dense forests of sombre spruce and fir, and rendered beautiful by countless numbers of brilliant col-ored rhododendra and honey suckle
