In the second round Hearld concluded that some of Sullivan's blows were rather heavy for friendliness, and he retalisted, seemingly much to the delight of Sullivan, who had by this time commenced to rain in his sledge-hammer blows so rapidly that his opponent might have thought he was being passed through a threshingmachine. In the midst of the melee the police rushed in and separated them. Sullivan was found to be nearly exhausted, but not so much that he would not fight again, for, seeing a certain reporter on the ground he made a dash for him and was only kept at bay by a drawn revolver. The champion afterwards remarked that Hearld was not only long-winded, but very gamey, and to have gotten the better of him it had
