The Use of Friends.

A sage or a cynic who sought a subject for an essay might do worse than to consider the uses of friends, and the proper part which friendship should play in a rightly human life. Every man has about him people of whom he is accustomed to think, more or less exactly, as friends, but so weak is human nature, that it seldom occurs to us to reflect whether we do anything to deserve from those persons a return of that noble title. It is of course merely saying over the often repeated charge that humanity is selfish to declare that men are far more apt to regard their friends as so many resources to be used to the best advantage, and fortunately for the credit of the race there is no lack of proof that real affection, genuine friendship, is by no means a lost art, or even a rare one.

There is something especially vicious and debasing in the idea of using friends in the sense of getting what we can out of them. The man who had not rather serve those of whom he is fond than to be served by them, is unworthy of friendship, because he is incapable of it. When the clergyman on the witness stand in New York declared that he always expected to make his friends useful, he unconsciously gave a more fatal picture of his ignoble nature than could have been drawn in the most vivid word painting of the opposing side. No cross-questioning, however adroit, could have elicited a confession more damaging to his character. When the astute lawyer arguing the case alluded to him as "the clerical gentlemen who makes his friends useful" he appealed straight to the truest instincts of the jurors, and the stroke told most effectively.

The French have a bitter proverb to the effect that "in love there is one who loves and one who consents to be loved, but certainly friendship, if it exists at all, must be mutual; and even could one so far lower his standard as to regard in merely a utilitarian light one of whom he is fond, he could not without absolute self-degradation take advantage of another's fondness for himself. If a man is known by the company he keeps, still more surely is he known by his attitude toward those nearest his affections, and it may be laid down as an inflexible rule that it is well utterly avoid companionship or community of interest with that man whose boast or practice it is "to make use of his friends."—Boston Courier.

A Large City.

If any one were to walk one way through all the streets of London, he would be obliged to go a distance of two thousand six hundred miles, or as far as it is across the American continent from New York to San Francisco. This will give an idea of what would have to be done in order to see even the greater part of London.

In approach to this city, as well as in our rambles through its streets, we shall not be struck so much by its splendid and imposing appearance as by its immensity. Go where we may, there seems to be no end to the town. It is fourteen miles one way, and eight miles the other contains a population of nearly four million people, which is greater, indeed, than that of Switzerland or the kingdoms of Denmark and Greece combined. We are told on good authority that there are more Scotchmen in London than in Edinburgh, more Irishmen than in Dublin, and more Jews than in Palestine, with foreigners from all parts of the world, including a great number of Americans. Yet there are so many Englishmen in London, that one is not likely to notice the presence of these people of other nations.

This vast body of citizens, some so rich that they never can count their money, and some so poor that they never have any to count, eat every year four hundred thousand oxen, one and a half million sheep, eight million chickens and game birds, not to speak of calves, hogs, and different kinds of fish. They consume five hundred million oysters, which, although it seems like a large number, would only give, if equally divided among all the people, one oyster every third day to each person. There are three hundred thousand servants in London enough people to make a large city; but as this government one servant to each citizen, it is quite evident that a great many of the people must wait on themselves. Things are very unequally divided in London; and I have no doubt that instead of there being one servant to twelve persons, some of the rich lords and ladies have twelve servants apiece.—St. Nicholas.

Good Results in Every Case.

D. A. Bradford, wholesale paper dealer of Chatham, N. C., writes that he was seriously afflicted with a severe cold that settled on his lungs; had tried many remedies without benefit. Being induced to try Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, did so and was entirely cured by use of a few bottles. Since which time he has used it in his family for all Coughs and Colds, with best results. This is the experience of thousands whose lives have been saved by this Wonderful Discovery. Trial bottles free at R. N. Duffy's drug store.
