Very few negroes can be taught or ced to run properly a gin, an engine, a mower or reaper; and he who undertakes to get similar work out of a negro to that which he gets out of a white man will, nine times out of ten, fail as completely as the one who tries to get race horse out of an ox. Again, in favorable weather, the farmer is unable to keep up close with his cotton; it will open much more rapidly than he can pick it out, core when allowing his hands to push shead without regard to trash. Consider the possibility of rain and wind blowing out the cotton on the ground and staining it. Which will bring him greater profits, leafy and trashy but white cotton, or storm, dirty, trashy and stained cotton. Unquestionably the first. And the farmer who pushes on his cotton picking as rapidly as possible, who shuts his eyes a good deal about trash, and has in consequence the least storm cotton, exhibits decidedly the best judgment. Let any one inspect a gin through which storm outton is passing, and he will quickly understand why there is often so much storm of the storm and the storm and the storm and the storm of even when allowing his hands to tand why there is often so much lift and grit in cotton; and appreciate the injustice, when the armer is accused of frauduently adding these to it.

If cotton is bulked so as to get slightly heated and then opened and fed to a gin through a feeder, much of its moisture will be diapidated. Feeders also contribute to the beauty of sample, as they cause the saws to do their work better, by the uniformity and regularity of the feeding. Feeders and condensers are most valuable and mportant additions to a gin, the first for reasons already assigned, the second for decreasing the risk of fire. A lint room is the tinder box of a gin house.
