What It Proves.

Nothing is so interesting to people the number of papers in the country devoted to political news and discussions. There are hundreds of successful political papers to one successful agricultural paper. Does this prove that farmers are more interested in politics than in farming? Or do they get more real help from political than from agricultural papers?-Goldsboro Argus.

It proves that a large majority of farmers learn what they know about farming by actual experience: they are aught by their fathers and they think they know more about it than the man who edits an agricultural paper. They take a newspaper to learn the news, and not to read about that which they already know and follow every day of their lives. To read a good, live newspaper after a week's steady work on the farm is refreshing. and in fact a luxury to a hard , working farmer. But to dig potatoes all day and pick up a paper at night and read until bed time how some other fellow that never dug a hill in his life, dug his is not a pleasure. The agricultural papers are not as interesting to our farmers as the political or newspapers, which contain farm articles as well as the news.

Any GREEN MANURING

NUMBER 9.

In the treatment of this subject some of the articles will not be confined strictly to green manuring. Farming is such a diversified subject that various divisions will be found profitable.

The following thought was given by a learned man in a recent speech before a cultured audience, and is so applicable to the sons and daughters of farmers that we reproduce it. He said : "We have expended enormous sums of money in the development of the material resources of this country and have rejoiced in the immense wealth of our mines, fields and forests. Yet the real source of the great strength and wealth of this nation lies in the brain and thought of the people, and the richest minds of undeveloped wealth are the boys and girls. If we develop their minds and teach them proper methods of labor, they in turn will de-vote their energies and brains to developing the material resources of this great land.'

Every farmer will find it profitable to make experiments, and to record the results, and to use every effort to interest his children in the subject of farming. Show them how to work in the beet manner and at the proper time. In less than half a century the children will own the whole world, and they must be prepared to make the most profitable se of it. Books on all subjects are very chesp. Agricultural magazines and news-papers are the best investment that can
