THE JOURNAL.

Genius.

When biological science is advanced enough for us to be able to put into definite form present ideas we shall probably be able to clear up the obscure and much-contested distinction between talent and genius. All will agree, one supposes, that wide versatility consorts much more naturally with what we commonly mark off as talent than with original genius. And the reason of this may, perhaps, be dimly described in the considerations here brought forward. For talent, when distinguished from genius, seems to mean superior ability to master ideas and to develop new applications of them. And it is evident that this kind of capability is not necessarily limited in its scope. Indeed, it would appear rather to exclude the idea of any unique excellence of aptitude in a particular region of activity. And it certainly does exclude an all-absorbing interest in some one circle of ideas. Hence the superior grades of talent appear as remarkable instances of versatility. Diderot, Lessing, better still, Macaulay may be said to represent talent raised to its highest power. And, if so, one may say that talent has for its physical substratum a splendid average brain—average, that is, in the general equality or indifference of its manifold functions, though greatly raised above average in point of strength. And do we not seem here to approach a physical explanation of the fact that while talent, as exalted common sense, is something normal and healthy, genius is apt to go off into abnormal one-sidedness?—Gentleman's Magazine.

DEFINITENESS IN KNOWLEDGE.
The memory will only be content when there is that accuracy which gives absolute confidence. Suspicion of inaccuracy is the most vicious element in memory. It is more satisfactory not to recall a thing than to recall it in such a way as not to know what we have recalled—whether the recollection is reliable, where the memory of fact shades into fancy. It requires the best mental activity, the closest observation, the clearest thought, the shapeliest discrimination, the cleanest classification, to give knowledge that definiteness which is indispensable to reliability in memory and accuracy in recollection.—Journal of Education.

FAIR maiden, if your lover's name is William, remember in asking a favor of him to say "please William" and not "do Bill." For he knows that if William pleases—the result will be a due Bill.

He who is a stranger to industry may have possessions, but is rarely happy, for labor gives relish to pleasure.
