The funeral services over the remains of the late Chief Justice Waite took place in the hall of the House of Representatives Wednesday at noon. There was a large assemblage present, including the highest dignituries of the land, and while the ceremonies were brief they were of a very imposing character. The proceedings of the two Houses of Congress were merged in the ceremonies and no public business was transacted. Immediately after the services, the casket was borne from the Capitol and conveyed to the railroad station, in charge of the committee who thereupon Isaac H.
