THE JOURNAL

THE MIDNIGHT WIND.

Deep in the stillness of the night,
From out its dark and dreary tower
The old clock strikes the midnight hour.
And echoes about the mountain side,
The only sound that breaks the solitude,
With a soft, sweet, sad, and strange
They've only left a faint, faint
Whisper in deep tones that come out
The night.

The hour has passed, the night is o'er,
Like the still of the day,
Faint and fainter—dying, dying,
Like a voice of long ago.

Woman's Wit.

It is of her to be certain to try and reason with a superstition. Some of the most reasonable beings have their unreasonable doubts. "I don't believe in ghosts, but I'm afraid of them," said Madame de Stael, one of the most intellectual women of her time, or since. Illustrative of this point, a gentleman who fears nothing, and believes less, tells how, after he had pepped the question and been accepted, he and his betrothed agreed that the marriage ceremony should be celebrated on the lady's birthday next ensuing. It seems to be one of the little eccentricities of the feminine world, the desire to have the wedding performed on her birthday. Seems more romantic, I presume, to the dear creature, to leave their state of single blessedness on the anniversary of their entrance to this world.

Curiosity of Children—What It May Do.

The curiosity of the child is the philosophy of the man,—or at least, to abate somewhat of our sweeping generalization, the curiosity of the child very frequently grows into the philosophy of the man. The former is a sort of pilot balloon, a little thing to be sure, but a critical one, nevertheless, and pretty sure to indicate of the height, as well as the direction, to be taken by the essentially expanded mind. Point out to us a boy of original, or what would generally be called eccentric habits, fond of rambling about a haunter of the wood-side and river bank; prone to collect what he may gather out, and then on his return to shut himself up in his room, and make experiments upon his gatherings,—to inquire into the natural history of each according to its kind,—point such a one out to us, and we should have no difficulty in pronouncing him, without the aid of physiognomy, to be of far better augury than his fellow who does nothing but pore over his books, never dreaming that there is any knowledge beyond them.

Our philosophical guesses, from Newton to Darwin, were boys of original minds, and fond of investigating natural secrets, and we know the nature of things, they must generally be. The spirit that is powerful enough to choose and take its own course, instead of being bound to the tide, must be a spirit of right excellent promise.
