THE JOURNAL.

"Eleanor Dare."
 THOS. C. RADHAM.
 The Cradle of liberty gallantly rocked,
 And the banner of hope spread out to the breeze,
 As the steerage of "Raleigh" the waters unlocked
 And neared the Isle of "Fortunate Fields."
 And Tyranny hid in the reef of the sail,
 That folded to meet the approach of the gale.
 But heart of faith and pride was there,
 As it beat in the bosom of "Eleanor Dare."
 Nor the waters of ocean with deep sounding roll,
 Nor the lightning's flash that lit the dark sky;
 Could break the peace surrounding the soul,
 Nor the light of freedom that shone in the eye.
 And the chief looked forth to the darkening west,
 Where a star appeared o'er the "Isle of the Blessed."
 Brighter it grew as they sped with the air,
 And flushed was the cheek of "Eleanor Dare."
 Springing, at dawn, to the foremost prow,
 That rose and fell with the ocean's breath—
 The sunniest calm that ever touched brow,
 Was theirs! as they saw the vine clad health.
 The ships are moored in the harbor near—
 And the davits turn, their boots to clear—
 And the sailors rush—with "prepare,
 The chieftain's boat for "Eleanor Dare."
 Firm and glad as she neared the spot,
 Where her comely form was soon to stand—
 Not one of her sex shared her lot—
 Alone! her print marked the sand.
 And when it touched the strange white shore,
 The love of freedom spread her o'er—
 She sported off in the woodland green,
 And nursed the thought of freedom's queen—
 And was not the mother true,
 Who first did brave the stormy deep?
 Did friends and compeers bid adieu,
 As free to go, made her pulses leap.
 Here hopeless man received her smile—
 And here she bore her only child—
 The infant breath that breathed the air—
 Her name's enough; Virginia Dare!

And near three hundred years have rolled,
 Their cycle o'er old Roanoke Isle,
 When Raleigh's banners there unfold'd,
 And there was born the Saxon child.
 No mark of memory now you'll find—
 The same—the child has left behind,
 In all and when a stranger visits there,
 No slab is seen for Eleanor Dare.
