The fire at Bingham school on the 4th inst. which destroyed a number of rooms and caused considerable loss, and the one that occurred December 24th were both of incendiary origin, and there are grounds of belief that the same person was the cause of both fires. Col. Bingham, Superintendent of the school offers $1,000 and the insurance companies $500 reward for the conviction of the incendiary.

The condensed narrative that we publish this morning of the life and public services of the distinguished Southern patriot, Gen. John R. Cooke, will be read with intense interest by many of his surviving followers in this section. Such a pure and noble life, conscientiously and unflinchingly devoted to duty is an inspiring study for any one. He was a leader worthy of any followers and the men in his command were worthy of such a leader, and the deeds of valor they jointly performed will ever be proudly remembered by their native land they served so well.

Skill and Courage Recognized.

One of New Berne's native young men, Lieut. James B. Hughes, U. S. A., son of Dr. James B. Hughes, has just received honorary mention from the Government for valuable service in Indian troubles.

A dispatch from Washington to the Baltimore Sun says the War Department has issued an order publishing the names of officers and men who distinguished themselves by specially meritorious acts or conduct in service in 1887. Among the five mentioned are "First Lieut. C. F. Johnson and Second Lieut. J. B. Hughes, tenth cavalry, for vigilance and zeal, rapidity and persistence of pursuit and capture of renegade Indian scouts from San Carlos Agency, and in making the surrounding country practically untenable for hostile Indians." This is quite a compliment to so young an officer. Our boys can be relied on when duty calls.

Progress.
It is very important in this age of vast material progress that a remedy be pleasing to the taste and to the eye, easily taken, acceptable to the stomach and healthy in its nature and effects. Possessing these qualities, Syrup of Figs is the one perfect laxative and most gentle diuretic known.

Nearly Frantic.
Has it ever been your misfortune to be brought into frequent contact with a person excessively nervous. If so, you must be aware that trivial causes, unnoticed by the vigorous, drive a nervous invalid to the verge of distraction. It is as unnecessary to particularize these as it is impossible to guard against them. The root of the evil is usually imperfect digestion and assimilation. To assist these functions, and through their renewed, completed, discharge to reinforce weak nerves, in conjunction with other portions of the physical organism, is within the power of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, systematically and continuously used. There is no dis-appointment here, no matter what or how grievous the failures of other so-called tonics. No sedative or opiate—avoid both—can compare with this invigorating nerve tranquilizer. Constipation, biliousness, malaria, rheumatism, kidney troubles are cured by it.

GEN. COOKE IS DEAD.

Sketch of the Life of the Distinguished Confederate Commander—Services as a Citizen—Family Connections, &c.

Another general officer of the Confederate army has answered the roll-call across the river and under the shade of the trees.
General John R. Cooke, whose virtues as a citizen, whose loyalty as a friend, and whose integrity as a business man were equalled only by his gallantry as a soldier, died Friday morning at 4 minutes after 12 o'clock.
For some months General Cooke had been an ill man. Indeed he had not been well since the unveiling of the Lee monument, and since last fall had kept his room pretty closely, save on two or three occasions, when his energetic nature would assert itself in obedience to some public call. It was only on last Saturday, however, that his illness assumed an alarming character and his friends realized the fact that the end was so near at hand.

On Sunday his sister, Mrs. J. E. B. Stuart, of Staunton, and his wife's brother, Mr. Patton, of Culpeper, were telegraphed for and they arrived next day. While the general was then slightly stronger than on the preceding day it was clearly apparent that his end was near at hand and that he could not live more than a few days at longest.

HIS LAST HOURS.

Hour by hour the brave soldier grew weaker, but his mind was perfectly clear and he fully realized that the span of his earthly existence was short. He was entirely resigned and faced death with firm and resolute courage. Yesterday he talked freely about the change that was soon to occur, and discussed the arrangements for his funeral and who should be named as pall-bearers.

FROM A FIGHTING FAMILY.

The deceased sprang from fighting stock and was cast in a heroic mould. His father, General Phillip St. George Cooke, who survives him, and who was born in Frederic county, Va., in 1809, saw over forty-five years of active service in the United States army, and in that army the son was cradled. The former graduated from West Point in 1827, and participated in the Black-Hawk and Mexican wars and several Indian expeditions. He commanded in Kansas during the troubles of 1856-'57, was the head of the Utah expedition in 1857-'57, and in 1859 prepared a new system of cavalry tactics, which was subsequently adopted by the Government. At the beginning of the late civil war he cast his fortunes with the Union, and during the Peninsula campaign commanded all the Federal cavalry. After the war he was in charge of military departments at several points until placed on the retired list.

YOUTH ON THE FRONTIER.

General John R. Cooke, the son, was born at Jefferson Barracks, Missouri, in 1833, and most of his youth was spent on the frontier with his father. He was educated at Harvard as a civil engineer and promised to attain distinction in that profession, but all of his tastes prompted him to apply for an appointment in the army. This he secured, and when the war broke out he had had considerable experience in Indian warfare and had reached the position of first lieutenant in the Eighth infantry, then stationed at the mouth of San Pedro river, in Arizona.

RESPONDS TO VIRGINIA'S CALL.

When Virginia seceded and it was apparent that war was inevitable, General Cooke responded to her call without hesitation. Resigning his commission in the United States army and severing tender family ties he offered his sword to his mother. He was ordered to report to General Holmes, at Fredericksburg, and soon after the first battle of Manassas raised a company of light artillery, which did splendid service along the Potomac.

NORTH CAROLINA CALLS HIM.

In February, 1862, he was made major and chief of artillery in the Department of North Carolina, from which position in April of that year he was elected colonel of the Twenty-Seventh North Carolina regiment and ordered to Virginia. His regiment was attached to A. P. Hill's command. Through the campaign of 1862 he led his regiment with great skill and gallantry and at Sharpsburg won the admiration of the entire army. When ordered to hold a certain portion of the line at all hazards he replied that though his ammunition was exhausted he would stay where he was as long as he had a man or a bayonet left. The record of his regiment subsequently showed that this was no idle boast. During that battle eighteen out of twenty-six of the commissioned officers of the regiment were killed or wounded. Soon after Sharpsburg he was made a brigadier-general, and until the close of the war commanded a brigade of North Carolinians, who have shed a lustre upon the name of the Old North State that will live as long as will history. It was with his brigade as it had been with his regiment. He watched over the men with a fatherly care and whatever could be secured for their comfort from the commissary and quartermaster departments General Cooke would have. Officers and privates idolized him, and Cooke's brigade could always be depended upon for extra hazardous service. The brigade was composed of the Fifteenth, Twenty-seventh, Forty-sixth, Forty-eighth, and Fifty-ninth North Carolina regiments and all through the war he and his brigade were found in the thickest of the fray.

General Cooke was wounded seven times. On Marye's Heights he was struck in the forehead just over the left eye by a bullet. Ere that wound had healed, and when there was only a film between him and death he got up out of his bed and went back to his command.

AT SPOTSYLVANIA COURTHOUSE.

At Spotsylvania Courthouse at a time when our centre was sorely pressed General Gordon suggested to General Lee that a certain movement be made on the right in order to relieve the centre. Some of the other general officers advised against it, but General Lee finally gave the order for attack. Cook's men were in the court-house yard.

"Standing and dying and ease," and their commander on the ground wounded in the leg.

Gordon in the excitement of the moment rode up to them and exclaimed: "I will lead these men."

With face ghastly pale and eyes flashing, General Cooke sprang forward, and objected. General Gordon, taking in the situation at a glance, courteously saluted and said, "Pardon me, General Cooke. I thought you were too badly wounded. Allow me to go in as one of your aids."

"You can go as one of my aids, but you cannot lead my men while I am here," rejoined General Cooke as he flung himself at the head of his brigade and gave the order to advance. "Then followed," said a member of A. P. Hill's staff, who witnessed the movement, "one of the most magnificent spectacles ever seen in war."

GENERAL LEE'S OPINION.

No officer in the Confederate army bore a more enviable reputation than General Cooke for prompt obedience to orders, skill in handling his men, splendid dash in the charge, or heroic, patient, stubborn courage in the defence. General Lee's high opinion of General Cooke and his command is best illustrated in a gentle rebuke the great Confederate chieftain administered to his sturdy brigadier on the lines in front of Richmond. General Cooke was in his tent suffering from his wounds and facial neuralgia when General Lee rode up, called him out, and asked whether the breastworks had been changed as directed by the engineers.

"No," replied General Cooke impatiently, "and I do not believe they ever will be."

General Lee moved off, followed by his staff and General Cooke. An inspection of the line showed that at several points it had been finished and work all along it was progressing satisfactorily. Several times during the ride General Lee remarked to the thoroughly confused Brigadier, "This seems to be completed," and finally when the end of the portion of the work to which Cooke's men had been assigned had been reached turned with a quiet smile and said: "I think, General, it will be finished all right. If not, it will be the first time that Cooke and his North Carolinians failed to do their duty."

BUSINESS IN RICHMOND.

At the close of the war General Cooke entered mercantile life in Richmond and succeeded in establishing a large family grocery business. He never sought public office or notoriety, but public position frequently sought him, his modesty giving him popularity that few men possessed. He was one of the first commanders of Lee Camp, Confederate Veterans, and acted as chief of staff upon the occasion of the laying of the corner stone of the Lee Monument October 27, 1887, and also at the monument unveiling on the 29th of May, 1890. Whenever a demand was made by his fellow citizens upon his time or talents he met it cheerfully, counting no sacrifice he could make too great.

"The bravest are the tenderest."

The loving are the daring." In his church he was a zealous worker; in the private circle a charming companion, and his life abounded in charity, of word, thought, and deed. His espousal of the Confederate cause estranged him from his parents, to whom he was devotedly attached, but about five years ago a complete reconciliation took place.

General Cooke married Miss Nannie G. Patton, of Fredericksburg, who, with eight children, survives him. His sister married General J. E. B. Stuart, the great Confederate cavalry leader.

When the war closed General Cooke was acting division commander for the second time during the struggle, and in that position he exhibited the same capacity for keeping his men well in hand and inspiring them with confidence that he had shown while in charge of smaller bodies of troops. He dared lead anywhere, and the example of his splendid courage was such that men dared follow without question.

"Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy."

This is Shakespear's advice to you young man and it is good advice, too. It does not need as long a purse in our day and generation to dress well as it did in his. Now, you can dress well for about $10.00, as that will buy a very respectable suit, but we have higher priced ones, and if you want something extra we have the nicest line of samples in the city. In fact they represent a stock of $200,000. They are from the great Clothiers, Rogers, Peet & Co. When you need anything, call and see us; if we haven't got it, N. Y. is only about 36 hours away.
